EDITORIAL NOTICE.

THROUGH 'the good hand of GOD' upon the Editor, and his valued assistants, (who have been the same in this vol. as the preceding,) another stage is reached, in this undertaking of great labor and high responsibility. Grateful to GOD and to the religious community, for the degree of favor accorded to the portions of the work already published, the Editor trusts, that the present volume will not be found less valuable in its preparation and accompaniments than the others. While it is not intended, as has been observed in the general Preface, to be a work of controversy, it could not but be, that, as a faithful exposition of GOD's Word, it should exhibit a distinct doctrinal character, for which, of course, no apology is offered. But that it should answer all the wishes of mere scholars, could hardly be expected by any judicious, reflecting individual. The long and patient investigations of critical questions, in which many modern writers have meritoriously indulged, as they could be appreciated only by persons acquainted with exegetics, and the original languages of the SS. have been but rarely followed out; yet, it is hoped, are occasionally, and as the greatly limited space assigned could permit, so alluded to, the sources of further information so indicated, and the results of biblical research in such manner reported, as will accommodate the wishes and necessities of those classes of readers, for whom the plan of the work was originally designed, and who are found among its patrons and friends.

That GOD may continue to bless the effort, and render it instrumental in promoting a more eager investigation of his Word, cause it to blend delight and interest with the inquiry, and glorify Himself in its usefulness, is, while he asks the continued prayers of the friends of Divine Truth, the hearty desire of the Editor,

WILLIAM JENKS.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES,

DERIVED PRINCIPALLY FROM THE MANNERS, CUSTOMS, ANTIQUITIES, TRADITIONS, AND FORMS OF SPEECH, RITES, CLIMATE, WORKS OF ART, AND LITERATURE, OF THE EASTERN NATIONS; EMBODYING ALL THAT IS VALUABLE IN THE WORKS OF ROBERTS, HARMER, BURDER, PAXTON, CHANDLER, AND THE MOST CELEBRATED ORIENTAL TRAVELLERS; EMBRACING ALSO THE SUBJECT OF THE FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY, AS EXHIBITED BY KEITH AND OTHERS. WITH DESCRIPTIONS OF THE PRESENT STATE OF COUNTRIES AND PLACES MENTIONED IN THE SACRED WRITINGS, ILLUSTRATED BY NUMEROUS LANDSCAPE ENGRAVINGS, FROM SKETCHES TAKEN ON THE SPOT.
EDITED BY REV. GEORGE BUSH, PROFESSOR OF HEBREW AND ORIENTAL LITERATURE IN THE NEW YORK CITY UNIVERSITY.

Next in worth and importance to the possession, is doubtless to be estimated the correct interpretation of the sacred volume. Indeed, it is the latter which gives its value to the former. A revelation not understood, or not intelligible, is no revelation, as far as its recipients are concerned. The position, therefore, that the meaning of the Bible is the Bible, we consider as unquestionably true, and consequently any new accession of light, which goes to clear up its obscurities, and cause its genuine sense to stand forth in bolder relief upon the inspired page, is in reality enriching us with a larger amount of its treasures, and virtually bestowing upon us added communications of the Divine will. In this view, the progressive elucidation of the scriptures, whether by the expository labors of critics, the researches of travellers, or the fulfilments of prophecy, may be compared to the gradual rolling away of the morning mist from a splendid landscape. As the sun advances, the shades retire, and new and interesting features of the prospect are continually opening upon the delighted eye of the spectator. Or, it may be said to resemble the slow, but momentous process of unfolding the ancient papyri, which the ravages of time and fire have spared among the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Here, as every successive word and letter, which can be redeemed from the crisp and crumbling texture of the blackened parchment, is noted down with the most scrupulous care, as forming a part of the continuous record, and going to make out its entire sense; so the sense of the sacred volume is gradually elicited, item by item, and needs only to be collected and treasured up with equal solicitude, in order to constitute a possession of infinitely more value than the choicest literary relics of antiquity. Perhaps it may safely be affirmed, that the materials are at this moment in existence, for the satisfactory solution of nearly every obscure passage of holy writ: but the great desideratum is to have them brought together—to collect them from their wide dispersion over a countless multitude of writings, in various languages, which the great majority of Christians can neither procure nor understand. It is only in this way that they can be made really available to the great end which they are calculated to subserve; and far from idle are the claims of any one who professes to bring from scattered sources a new quota to the general stock of biblical illustration.

As the Bible, in its structure, spirit, and costume, is essentially an Eastern book, it is obvious that the natural phenomena, and the moral condition of the East, should be made largely tributary to its elucidation. In order to appreciate fully the truth of its descriptions, and the accuracy, force, and beauty of its various allusions, it is indispensable that the reader, as far as possible, separate himself from his ordinary associations, and put himself, by a kind of mental transmigration, into the very circumstances of the writers. He must set himself down in the midst of oriental scenery—gaze upon the sun, sky, mountains, and rivers of Asia—go forth with the nomade tribes of the desert—follow their flocks—travel with their caravans—rest in their tents—lodge in their khans—load and unload their camels—drink at their watering-places—pause during the heat of the day under the shade of their palms—cultivate the fields with their own rude implements—gather in or glean after their harvests—beat out and ventilate the grain in their open thrashing-floors—dress in their costume—note their proverbial or idiomatic forms of speech, and listen to the strain of song or story, with which they beguile the vacant hours. In a word, he must surround himself with, and transfuse himself into, all the forms, habitudes, and usages of oriental life. In this way only can he catch the sources of their imagery, or enter into full communion with the genius of the sacred penmen.

While, therefore, we readily concede the very high importance of critical and philological research in dissipating the obscurities of the scriptures, and fixing their exact sense, we cannot, at the same time, but think that the collateral illustrations derived from this source, are deserving of at least equal attention from the student of revelation. The truth is, the providence of God, which is never more worthily employed than about his Word, seems now to be directing the eyes of his servants, as with pointed finger, to the immense stores of elucidation constantly accumulating from this quarter. The tide of travel within a few years has turned remarkably to the East. Animated either by the noble spirit of missionary enterprise, of commercial speculation, of military adventure, or laudable curiosity, men of intelligence and observation have made their way into every region on which the light of revelation originally shone; exploring its antiquities, mingling with its inhabitants, detailing its manners and customs, and displaying its physical, moral, and political circumstances. From these expeditions they have returned laden with the rich results of their industry, and the labors of the pen and the pencil have made thousands partakers of the benefits of their toils. Little more than half a century ago, when the justly celebrated Observations of Harmer were given to the public, the range of materials to which he had access was comparatively limited. The travels of Chardin, Pococke, Shaw, Maundrell, Pitts, D'Arvieux, with Russel's Natural History of Aleppo, were his principal authorities—authorities, it is true, which have not yet been wholly superseded. But since his time, what an immense accession has the department of oriental travels received! The names of Volney, Niebuhr, Mariti, Clarke, Chateaubriand, Porter, Burckhardt, Buckingham, Morier, Seetzen, De Lamartine, Laborde, exhaust but a small part of the list of eastern tourists, whose labors have gone to make us familiarly acquainted with the land of patriarchs, prophets, and apostles. How desirable that the scattered gleams of illustrative light, which shine in their works, should be concentrated into one focus of illumination! This is the task which we have essayed in the present volume.

In entering upon and advancing in this task, we have been more and more impressed with the remarkable fact of the permanence of eastern usages. To the question, therefore, whether the state of things in the East, as described by modern travellers, really coincides with that which existed at the time the scriptures were written, so that one may be cited as conveying a correct idea of the other; we may reply, in the words of Sir John Chardin, one of the most respectable and authentic of the number:—"The language of that divine book (especially of the Old Testament) being oriental, and very often figurative and hyperbolical, those parts of scripture which are written in verse, and in the prophecies, are full of figures and hyperboles, which, as it is manifest, cannot be well understood without a knowledge of things from whence such figures are taken, which are natural properties and particular manners of the countries to which they refer. I discerned this in my first voyage to the Indies: for I gradually found a greater sense and beauty in divers passages of scripture than I had before, by having in my view the things, either natural or moral, which explained them to me; and in perusing the different translations which the greatest part of the translators of the Bible had made, I observed that every one of them (to render the expositions, as they thought, more intelligible) used such expressions as would accommodate the phrase to the places where they writ: and which did not only many times pervert the text, but often rendered the sense obscure, and sometimes absurd also. In fine, consulting the commentators upon such kind of passages, I found very strange mistakes in them, and that they had long guessed at the sense, and did but grope (as in the dark) in search of it. And from these reflections I took a resolution to make my remarks upon many passages of the scriptures; persuading myself that they would be equally agreeable and profitable for use. And the learned, to whom I communicated my design, encouraged me very much, by their commendations, to proceed in it: and more especially when I informed them, that it is not in Asia, as in our Europe, where there are frequent changes, more or less, in the form of things, as the habits, buildings, gardens, and the like. In the East they are constant in all things; the habits are at this day in the same manner as in the preceding ages; so that one may reasonably believe, that in that part of the world, the exterior form of things (as their manners and customs) are the same now as they were two thousand years since, except in such changes as have been introduced by religion, which are, nevertheless, very inconsiderable."—(Preface to Travels in Persia, p. 6.) Morier, an eastern traveller, says, "The manners of the East, amid all the changes of government and religion, are still the same; they are living impressions from an original mould: and at every step, some object, some idiom, some dress, or some custom of common life, reminds the traveller of ancient times, and confirms, above all, the beauty, the accuracy, and the propriety of the language and the history of the Bible." * * *

This steadfast resistance to the spirit of innovation and change, which thus remarkably distinguishes the nations of the East, will probably, in the providence of God, remain unsubdued, till it shall have answered all the important purposes of biblical elucidation, when it will give way to the all-pervading, all-regenerating influence of the Bible itself, borne upon the bosom of a new tide of civilization and improvement, which shall, ere long, set in upon the East from the nations of Europe, and the great continent of the West.

In the mean time, while the inevitable doom of revolution and transformation that awaits the East, lingers, it behooves us to make the most, for useful purposes, of that state of society which still exists, but which, ere long, will have passed away. With this view, we have endeavored to embody in the present volume a large mass of oriental illustration. The work is strictly of an eclectic character. Postponing the claims of originality to those of practical utility, the Editor, after arraying before him the amplest store of materials which he could command, set himself to the task of selecting and arranging the most valuable portions which he could bring within the limits of his plan. The kindred works of Harmer, Burder, Paxton, Taylor's edition of Calmet, (five vols. 4to.,) scarcely any of which are in common accessible to the majority of biblical students, have been diligently gleaned, and all their important contents transferred to our pages. As these works are not likely ever to be reprinted in this country, there appeared no other way to arrest their progress to oblivion, and to secure a larger and wider circulation to the valuable matter which they contain.

But the range of selection has been by no means confined to the works now mentioned. So prolific has been the press within the last twenty or thirty years, of books of eastern travels, illustrative of manners, customs, and religion, that our resources in this department have been almost indefinitely multiplied.

As the present work is designed to be marked by somewhat of the same Comprehensive character which distinguishes the other biblical works lately issued from the press of the Publishers, the illustrations bear upon numerous other points than those relating to manners and customs.

The subject of the Fulfilment of Prophecy cannot well be lost sight of by any one conversant at once with the scriptures and the reports of modern travellers. The topographical descriptions of many of the most noted places of scripture, a department to which particular attention has been given in the ensuing pages, suggests at once the divine predictions bearing upon their future doom. The researches of tourists, both skeptics and Christians, have poured a flood of light upon this subject. It is perfectly astonishing, to one who has never examined the subject, to find how literally and minutely the prophetic declarations of scripture have been fulfilled, so that even infidel travellers and historians, as Volney and Gibbon, in their accounts of nations and countries, have unwittingly used for description, almost the words of scripture in which the events are foretold. Volney, particularly, (one of the bitterest opposers of Christianity,) in his published travels in the East, has afforded, unwillingly and unthinkingly, a wonderful attestation to the truth of the Bible, in the relation of facts which came under his own eye. There needs no better witness. Indeed, it is impossible for the most determined infidel carefully to examine and weigh this subject, and not be forced to feel that the Bible is divine: or, in the words of Bishop Newton, "he is reduced to the necessity, either to renounce his senses, deny what he reads in the Bible, and what he sees and observes in the world, or acknowledge the truth of prophecy, and consequently, of divine revelation." The researches of travellers in Palestine have been abundant, and the prophecies thereby verified are numerous and distinct, so that the facts may be related literally in the language of the prophecy. To use the words of a late writer in the London Quarterly Review, "we confess that we have felt more surprise, delight, and conviction, in examining the accounts which the travels of Burckhardt, Mangles, Irby, Leigh, and Laborde, have so recently given of Judea, Edom, &c. than we have ever derived from any similar inquiry. It seems like a miracle in our own times. Twenty years ago we read certain portions of the prophetic scriptures, with a belief that they were true, because other similar passages had, in the course of ages, been proved to be so, and we had an indistinct notion, that all these (to us) obscure an indefinite denunciations had been—we knew not very well when or how—accomplished: but to have graphic descriptions, ground plans, and elevations, showing the actual existence of all the heretofore vague and shadowy denunciations of God against Edom, does, we confess, excite our feelings, and exalt our confidence in prophecy, to a height that no external evidence has hitherto done. . . . . Here we have—bursting upon our age of incredulity, by the labors of accidental, impartial, and sometimes incredulous" (infidel) "witnesses—the certainty of existing facts, which fulfil what were considered hitherto the most vague and least intelligible of the prophecies. The value of one such contemporaneous proof is immense." Indeed, it would seem that in regard to such places as Babylon, Nineveh, Tyre, Moab, Edom, and others, the providence of God was no less conspicuous in bringing to light, in these latter ages, the evidence of the accomplishment of those prophecies, than formerly in working the accomplishment itself. The valuable labors of Keith in this department, arranged in accordance with our general plan, so as to exhibit the commentary under its appropriate text, will be found to have added much to the interest and profit of the reader in perusing our pages.

The numerous highly finished engravings, executed by distinguished artists, from sketches taken on the spot, will go also greatly to enhance the value of this portion of the illustrations.

A critical note is occasionally thrown in, where the point of a passage seemed capable of a happy explication, especially from a more exact analysis of the import of the original terms.

As a prominent object aimed at throughout has been, not only to increase the facilities for a complete understanding of the inspired volume, but also to multiply the evidences, and vindicate the claims of its divine original, a portion of our pages has been allotted to the direct consideration of infidel objections and cavils. The most important extracts of this description have been taken from the valuable and now rare "Life of David," by Chandler, in which the insinuations of Bayle against the character of David, are canvassed and refuted with distinguished ability, though perhaps somewhat more verbosely than is consistent with the taste either of modern writers or readers.

The original and acute remarks of Michaelis, on many points of the Mosaic laws and ritual, though sometimes bordering upon the fanciful, disclose a profound acquaintance with the genius of the East, and are generally entitled to deep attention.

As the authorities employed in the preparation of the ensuing pages are usually quoted in a very general way—for the most part merely by citing the writer's name—it will probably be rendering an important service to many of our readers, to give a more ample conspectus of the sources upon which we have drawn for materials. The list is by no means complete, nor, as many have served us at second hand, is it perhaps practicable or necessary that it should be.

☞ The importance of the present work must be obvious, and being altogether illustrative, without reference to doctrines, or other points in which Christians differ, it is hoped it will meet with favor from all who love the sacred volume, and that it will be sufficiently interesting and attractive to recommend itself, not only to professed Christians of all denominations, but also to the general reader. The arrangement of the texts illustrated with the notes, in the order of the chapters and verses of the authorized version of the Bible, will render it convenient for reference to particular passages, while the copious Index at the end, will at once enable the reader to turn to every subject discussed in the volume.

PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENT.

In presenting the public with another of their Comprehensive volumes, the publishers take the opportunity to acknowledge the favor which their efforts to circulate useful and religious knowledge in a condensed and cheap form have hitherto met with. "The Comprehensive Commentary on the Bible," "The Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge," and "The Polyglott Bible" edited by the Rev. Mr. Warne, have met with a sale far surpassing that of any other work of equal magnitude in the United States, or in the world, in the same length of time. The Vermont Chronicle well remarks, that they might be all bound to match, and appropriately entitled,

"THE COMPREHENSIVE LIBRARY OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE."

Encouraged by the great popularity of those works, the same publishers have been induced to bring forward the present volume, in the hope that it may find equal favor with the public, as they have no doubt that it is equally deserving of it.

It will be seen from a slight examination, that this, like its predecessors, is comprehensive in its character, embracing the substance and value of more than fifteen octavo volumes, together with a great amount of matter illustrative of the Scriptures, drawn from biblical writers, the accounts of oriental travellers, periodicals, &c. &c. (See the Preface for an explanation of the plan and a list of authors quoted.) The value of the materials of which the volume is composed, will be readily seen, and it would be superfluous to remark upon the peculiar qualifications of the editor.

☞ This volume is not designed to take the place of commentaries, but is a distinct department of biblical illustration, and may be used as a companion to the Comprehensive or any other Commentary, or the common Bible.

THE ENGRAVINGS

in the volume, it is believed, will form no small part of its attractions. No pains have been spared to procure such as should embellish the work, and at the same time illustrate the text. Objections that have been made to the pictures commonly introduced into the Bible, as being mere creations of fancy and the imagination, often unlike nature, and frequently conveying false impressions, cannot be urged against the pictorial illustrations of this volume. Here the fine arts are made subservient to utility, the landscape views being, without an exception, MATTER OF FACT views of places mentioned in Scripture, as they appear at the present day; thus in many instances exhibiting in the most forcible manner to the eye, the strict and literal fulfilment of the remarkable prophecies; "the present ruined and desolate condition of the cities of Babylon, Nineveh, Selah, &c., and the countries of Edom and Egypt, are astonishing examples, and so completely exemplify, in the most minute particulars, every thing which was foretold of them in the height of their prosperity, that no better description can now be given of them than a simple quotation from a chapter and verse of the Bible written two or three thousand years ago." The publishers are enabled to select from several collections lately published in London, the proprietor of one of which says, that "several distinguished travellers have afforded him the use of nearly Three Hundred Original Sketches" of Scripture places, made upon the spot. "The land of Palestine, it is well known, abounds in scenes of the most picturesque beauty. Syria comprehends the snowy heights of Lebanon, and the majestic ruins of Tadmor and Baalbec."

AN EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, AND NOTES,

ON THE BOOK OF RUTH.

AS a practical comment on the genuine effect of the Mosaic institutions on human welfare, as illustrating their spirit, and showing to how much happiness they naturally and necessarily led when properly observed, this sweet picture of agricultural life is a rich oriental gem, sparkling with clear and beautiful lustre, far down to us, from the distant, mutilated, dark and bloody records of the early history of our race! How ill could we spare it! How could the view of the Mosaic polity have been perfect without it! Let us receive with thankfulness, into good and honest hearts, the hoarded wealth of instruction this little book conveys! Even the infidel Voltaire says, 'The history of Ruth is written with a natural and affecting simplicity. We know nothing in either Homer or Herodotus that goes to the heart like this answer of Ruth to her mother, "Whither thou goest, I will go," &c. (1: 16, 17.) There is a sublimity in this simplicity. . . . . We have often said, that these times and manners have nothing in common with our own, whether good or bad, their spirit is not ours; their good sense is not ours. It is on this very account that the Pentateuch, the books of Joshua and Judges, are a thousand times more instructive than Homer and Herodotus.' Ex.

This short history of the domestic affairs of one particular family, fitly follows the book of Judges, (the events related here happening in the days of the Judges,) and fitly goes before the books of Samuel, because in the close it introduces David: yet the Jews, in their Bibles, separate it from both, and make it one of the five Megilloth, or Volumes, which they put together toward the latter end; in this order, Solomon's Song, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. Probably, Samuel wrote it. [And so the Talmudists think; which is most probable, and most generally received. Gill: so Gray, &c. Scott thinks 'Samuel wrote it after he had anointed David.'] It relates the afflictions first, and afterward the comfort, of Naomi; the conversion first, and afterward, the preferment, of Ruth. Many such events have happened, which perhaps we may think as well worthy to be recorded. But God saw fit to transmit the knowledge of these to us; and even common historians think they have liberty to choose their subject. The design of this book is, I. To lead to Providence; to show us how conversant it is about our private concerns, and to teach us in them all to have an eye to it, acknowledging God in all our ways, and in all events that concern us. See 1 Sam. 2: 7, 8. Ps. 113: 7—9. II. To lead to Christ, who descended from Ruth, and part of whose genealogy concludes the book, out of which it is fetched into Matt. 1. Let us remember the scene is laid in Beth-lehem, where our Redeemer was born. Henry.

It is not easy to fix the chronology of these events, there being no evidence to determine exactly under which of the Judges they occurred. Scott. The chief difficulty arises from the genealogical account of Matthew, which states that Boaz, the husband of Ruth, and great grandfather of David, was son of Salmon by Rachab; for if by Rachab we understand, as is usual, Rahab, the harlot, who protected Joshua's spies about A. M. 2552, it is difficult to conceive that only three persons, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse, should have intervened between her and David, who was not born till about 2919. We must however in this case conclude, either with the learned Usher, that the ancestors of David, as eminent for righteousness, or as designed to be conspicuous, because of the lineage of the Messiah, were blessed with extraordinary length of life, or else that the sacred writers mentioned in the genealogy only such names as were distinguished and known among the Jews. If, however, Boaz be considered as the grandfather of David, the history cannot by any computation be assigned to the time of Eli, under whose jurisdiction it is placed by Josephus, but at some earlier period, perhaps under Shamgar, agreeably to Usher, who places it in A. M. 2686, about 133 years after the conquest of Canaan. Gray.

The Jews thought it disgraceful to David to have derived his birth from a Moabitess, and with this they suppose Shimei reproached him. This book, therefore, contains intrinsic proof of its own verity, as it records a circumstance so little flattering to the sovereign of Israel. Hewlett, and Gray, after Jerome, and Calm.

The principal design of the book is, to give the genealogy of David, whom Samuel had anointed to be king of Israel, and from whom the Messiah was to come, and who therefore may be said to be the aim and scope of it, as He is of all Scripture; and whereby it appears that He sprung both from Jews and Gentiles, and is the Savior of both, and there is a good foundation for both to hope in Him; and the call and conversion of Ruth the Moabitess may be considered as a shadow, emblem, and pledge, of the conversion of the Gentiles. [This interesting and instructive narrative] furnishes out examples of bearing afflictions patiently, of industry, courteousness, kindness to strangers, and young converts; and none can doubt of the divine authority of this book that considers the use made of it in the genealogies of Christ by Matthew and Luke. [So also Scott and Henry (in substance) &c.] Gill.

CHAP. I.

Elimelech induced by famine to sojourn in Moab, dies there, 1—3. His two sons, having married women of Moab, die without children; and Naomi, Elimelech's widow, prepares to return to Israel, 4—6. Orpah and Ruth, her daughters-in-law, propose to accompany her; she dissuades them, and Orpah returns back, 7—14. Ruth determines to go with her, 15—18. They arrive at Beth-lehem, and Naomi answers the inquiries of her neighbors, 19—22.

NOW it came to pass, in the days when the judges *ruled, that a Judg. 2:16. * Heb. judged.

Chap. I. V. 1—5. In this ch. we have Naomi's afflictions, 1. as a distressed housekeeper, forced by famine to remove into the land of Moab; 2. as a mournful widow and mother, bewailing the death of her husband and her two sons; 3. as a careful mother-in-law, desirous to be kind to her two daughters, but at a loss how to be so, when she returns to her own country. Orpah she parts with in sorrow, Ruth she takes with her in fear. 4. As a poor woman sent back to the place of her first settlement, to be supported by the kindness of her friends. All these things were melancholy, and seemed against her, and yet all were working for good.

The first words give all the date we have of this story. It must be toward the beginning of the Judges' time, for Boaz, who married Ruth, was born of Rahab, who received the spies in Joshua's time. Some think it was in the days of Ehud, others of Deborah; Patrick thinks it was in the days of Gideon, because in his days only we read of a famine, Judg. 6: 3, 4. While the Judges were ruling, some one city, and some another, Providence takes particular cognizance of Beth-lehem, and has an eye to a King, to Messiah Himself.

Here is, I. A famine in that land flowing with milk and honey. This was one of the judgments God had threatened for their sins, Lev. 26: 19, 20. A fruitful land is turned into barrenness, to correct and restrain the luxury and wantonness of them that dwell therein.

II. A particular family in distress; that of Elimelech, which signifies my God a King; agreeable to the state of Israel when the Judges ruled, for the Lord was their king; and comfortable to him and his family in their affliction, for God was theirs, and He reigns for ever. Naomi signifies my amiable or pleasant one. Mahlon and Chilion, sickness and consumption, perhaps because weakly, and not likely to be long-lived. Such are the productions of our pleasant things, weak and infirm, fading and dying.

III. Their removal, v. 1, 2. It seems there was plenty in Moab, when there was scarcity in Israel. Common gifts of Providence are often bestowed in greater plenty on those that are strangers to God, than on those that know and worship Him. Moab is at ease from his youth, while Israel is emptied from vessel to vessel; Jer. 48: 11. not because God loves Moabites better, but because they have their portion in this life. Thither Elimelech goes to sojourn during the dearth, as Abraham, on the like occasion, to Egypt, and Isaac to the land of the Philistines. Now here, 1. Elimelech's care to provide for his family, and his taking his wife and children with him, were, without doubt, commendable. If any provide not for his own, he hath denied the faith. When in his straits he was not as the ostrich, Job 39: 16. he did not forsake his house. But, 2. I see not how his removal into the country of Moab could be justified. Abraham and Isaac were only sojourners in Canaan, and it was agreeable to their condition to remove; but the seed of Israel were now fixed, and ought not to remove into the territories of the heathen. What reason had Elimelech to go, more than his neighbors? If by any ill husbandry he had wasted his patrimony, and sold his land, or mortgaged it, (as it should seem, ch. 4: 3, 4.) which brought him into a more necessitous condition than others, the law of God had obliged his neighbors to relieve him; (Lev. 25: 35.) but that was not his case, for he went out full, v. 21. By those who tarried at home, it appears the famine was not so extreme, but that there was sufficient to support life; and his charge was but small, only two sons. But if he could not be content with the short allowance his neighbors took up with, nor live in hope, nor wait with patience, it was his fault, and by it he did dishonour God, and the good land He had given them, weaken the hands of his brethren, with whom he should have been willing to take his lot, and set an ill example to others. If all should do as he did, Canaan would be dispeopled. Note, It is an evidence of a discontented, distrustful, unstable spirit, to be weary of the place in which God hath set us, and to be for leaving it immediately, whenever we meet with any uneasiness or inconvenience in it. It is folly to think of escaping that cross, which, being laid in our way, we ought to take up. It is our wisdom to make the best of that which is, for it is seldom that changing our place is mending it. Or, if he would remove, why to Moab? Probably he would have found plenty in some of the tribes of Israel, those, for instance, on the other side Jordan, bordering on Moab; if he had that zeal for God and his worship, and that affection for his brethren, which became an Israelite, he would not have persuaded himself so easily to go to sojourn among Moabites.

IV. The marriage of his two sons to two of the daughters of Moab after his death, v. 4. All agree this was ill done: the Chaldee says, They transgressed the decree of the Word of the Lord, in taking strange wives. Those that bring young people into bad acquaintance, and take them out of the way of public ordinances, though they may think them well-principled, and armed against temptation, know not what they do, nor what will be the end thereof. It does not appear that the women they married, were proselyted to the Jewish religion, for Orpah is said to return to her gods, v. 15. It is a groundless tradition of the Jews, that Ruth was the daughter of Eglon king of Moab, yet the Chaldee paraphrast inserts it; but this and their other tradition, which he inserts likewise, cannot agree, that Boaz, who married Ruth, was the same with Ibzan who judged Israel 200 years after Eglon's death, Judg. 12.

V. The death of Elimelech and his two sons, and the consequent disconsolate condition of Naomi. Her husband died, v. 3. and her two sons, v. 5. soon after their marriage; the Chaldee says, Their days were shortened, because they transgressed the law in marrying strange wives. See here, we cannot expect to prosper when we go out of the way of duty. He that will save his life by any indirect courses shall lose it. One in a family is taken away, and that affliction is not duly improved, therefore God sends another of the same kind. Uncertain and transient are all our enjoyments here. It is wisdom then to make sure of those comforts that will be made sure, which death cannot rob us of. But how desolate was the condition, and how disconsolate the spirit, of poor Naomi! God alone has wherewithal to comfort.

V. 6—18. See here, I. The good affection Naomi bore the land of Israel, v. 6. Observe,

1. God, at last, returned in mercy to his people; for He will not contend always. At length God graciously visited his people in giving them bread. Plenty is God's gift, and it is his visitation which, by bread, the staff of life, holds our souls in life. Though this mercy be more striking when it comes after famine, yet if we have constantly enjoyed it, and never knew what famine meant, shall we think it the less valuable?

2. Naomi had often inquired of the state of her people, and still the tidings were discouraging; but, at last, she has good news of plenty in Bethlehem, and then she can think of no other than returning in duty thither again. Note, Forced absence from God's ordinances, and forced presence with wicked people, are great afflictions, but when the force ceases, and it is continued of choice, then it becomes a great sin. It should seem, she began to think of returning immediately on the death of her two sons: (1.) Because she looked upon that affliction to be a judgment on her family for lingering in the country of Moab. When death comes into a family, it ought to be improved for the reforming of what is amiss in it: when relations are taken away from us, we are put upon inquiry, whether, in some instance or other, we are not out of the way of our duty, that we may return to it. (2.) Because the land of Moab was now become a melancholy place to her. It is with little pleasure she can breathe in that air in which her husband and sons had expired; or go on that ground in which they lay buried out of her sight, but not out of her thoughts; now she will go to Canaan again. Earth is imbittered to us, that heaven may be endeared.

II. The good affection of her daughters-in-law, one of them especially, and her generous return of their good affection.

1. They were both so kind as to accompany her, some part of the way at least, when she returned toward the land of Judah. If she was resolved to go home, they would pay her all possible civility and respect at parting; and this was one instance of it, they would bring her on her

Verses 4, 5.

There is no reason to think, that either Orpah or Ruth was proselyted to the religion of Israel, before marriage; and consequently Mahlon and Chilion directly violated the divine law; for which some think their premature death without children was a punishment. (Lev. 20: 20, 21.) Probably Elimelech died soon after he came into the land of Moab, and his two sons followed him before ten years were expired; but it does not appear, how long after their marriage this took place. SCOTT.

Verses 6—10.

Perhaps Naomi had staid in Moab contrary to her inclination, from regard to her husband while he lived, and afterwards to her sons. She seems to have been a person of eminent faith and piety. SCOTT.

(8.) Return, &c.] 'It seems it was usual in Moab, as well as in Israel, for widows to dwell with their parents; and the women had

8 And Naomi said unto her two daughters-in-law, [p] Go, return each to her mother's house: [q] the LORD deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with [r] the dead, and with me.

9 The LORD grant you that ye may find [s] rest, each of you in the house of her husband. Then [t] she kissed them: and they lifted up their voice, and wept.

10 And they said unto her, [u] Surely we will return with thee unto thy people.

11 And Naomi said, Turn again, my daughters; why will ye go with me? are there yet any more sons in my womb, [x] that they may be your husbands?

12 Turn again, my daughters, go your way; for I am [y] too old to have an husband. If I should say, I have hope, if * I should have an husband also to-night, and should also bear sons; way, and help her as far as they went, for it does not appear she had any servant to attend her, v. 7. So Naomi, as became an Israelite, had been very kind and obliging, and had won their love, in which she is an example to all mothers-in-law; and Orpah and Ruth have a just sense of her kindness. Though they retained an affection to the gods of Moab, (v. 15.) and Naomi was still faithful to the God of Israel, yet that was no hinderance on either side to love and kindness, and all the good offices the relation required. Mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law are too often at variance, (Matt. 10: 35.) therefore it is the more commendable if they live in love; let all in that relation aim at the praise of doing so.

13 Would ye † tarry for them till they were grown? would ye stay for them from having husbands? nay, my daughters: for ‡ it grieveth me much for your sakes, that [z] the hand of the LORD is gone out against me.

2. When they had gone a little way with her, Naomi, with great affection, urged them to go back, v. 8, 9. Naomi suggests that their own mothers would be more agreeable to them than a mother-in-law, especially when their own mothers had houses, and their mother-in-law was not sure she had a place to lay her head in, which she could call her own.

She dismisses them, (1.) With commendation: Note, When we and our relations are parting, by death or otherwise, it is very comfortable, if we have both their testimony, and the testimony of our own consciences for us, that while we were together, we carefully endeavoured to do our duty in the relation; this will help to allay the bitterness of parting, and while we are together we should labor so to conduct ourselves. 2. With prayer. It is very proper for friends, to part with prayer. She sends them home with her blessing; and the blessing of a mother-in-law is not to be slighted. In this blessing she twice mentions the name Jehovah, that she might direct her daughters to look up to Him as the only Fountain of all good. It may be expected and prayed for in faith, that God will deal kindly with those that have dealt kindly with their relations; and, in particular, that they might be happy in marrying again. Note, [1.] It is very fit, that, according to the apostle's direction, the younger women, (and he speaks of young widows,) should marry, bear children, and guide the house. And it is a pity those who have approved themselves good wives, should not again be blessed with good husbands, especially those that, like these widows, have no children. [2.] The married state is a state of rest, such as this world affords, rest in the house of a husband, more than can be expected in the house of a mother, or a mother-in-law. [3.] This rest is God's gift. If any content and satisfaction be found in our outward condition, God must be acknowledged in it. Persons unequally yoked, find little rest even in the house of a husband. Let their affliction make those the more thankful, to whom the relation is comfortable; yet let God be the Rest of the soul, and no perfect rest thought of on this side heaven. (3.) She dismissed them with great affection; she kissed them; wished she had somewhat better to give them, but silver and gold she has none. However, this parting kiss shall be the seal of such a true friendship, as (though she never see them more) she will, while she lives, retain the pleasing remembrance of. If relations must part, let them thus part in love, that they may (if they never meet again in this world) meet in the world of everlasting love.

3. The two young widows could not think of parting with their good mother-in-law, so much had the good conversation of that pious Israelite won upon them; they not only lifted up their voice and wept, as loath to part, but professed a resolution to adhere to her, v. 10. Even Orpah, who afterward went back to her gods, now seemed resolved to go forward with Naomi. The sad ceremony of parting, and the tears shed, drew from her this protestation, but it did not hold. Strong passions, without a settled judgment, commonly produce weak resolutions.

4. Naomi sets herself to dissuade them from going with her, v. 11—13. If she had had any sons in Canaan, or any near kinsmen, whom she could have expected to marry the widows, it might have been some encouragement to them to hope for a comfortable settlement at Beth-lehem. Yet this was not all, she not only could not propose to marry them, but she knew not how to maintain them. The greatest grievance of that poor condition to which she was reduced, was, that she was not in a capacity to do for them as she would It grieveth me more for your sakes, than for my own, that the hand of the Lord is gone out against me. Observe, She judges herself chiefly aimed at in the affliction: 'I am the sinner, it is with me God is contending, I take it to myself.' This will become us when under affliction; though many others share in the trouble, yet we must hear as if it spoke only against us, and to us. She laments most the trouble that redounded to them. She was the sinner, but they the sufferers. It grieveth me much for your sakes. A gracious, generous spirit can better bear its own burden, than see it a grievance to others. 'Therefore turn again, my daughters, for alas, I am in no capacity to do you any kindness.'

But did Naomi do well, thus to discourage her daughters from going with her, when, by taking them with her, she might save them from the idolatry of Moab, and bring them to the faith and worship of the God of Israel? Naomi, no doubt desired to do that. But, she would not have them come on her account; (those that profess religion, only to oblige their friends and relations, or for the sake of company, will be converts of small value and of short continuance;) but she would have them make it their deliberate choice, and sit down first and count the cost, as it concerns those to do, that take up a profession of religion. It is good for us to be told the worst; our Savior took this course with him who, in the heat of zeal, spoke that bold word, Master, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest. Thoughts, ripened into resolves by serious consideration, are likely to be kept always in the imagination of the heart; whereas what is soon ripe, is soon rotten.

5. Orpah was easily persuaded to yield to her own corrupt inclination. They both lifted up their voices and wept again, (v. 14.) being much affected with the tender things Naomi had said; but it had a different effect on them; to Orpah it was a savor of death unto death; and served as an excuse for her apostasy. But, it strengthened Ruth's resolution, and her good affection to Naomi, with whose wisdom and goodness she was never so charmed, as on this occasion; thus to her it was a savor of life unto life. (1.) Orpah kissed her mother-in-law; i. e. took an affectionate leave of her, bid her farewell for ever, which showed she was loath to part from her; yet she did not love her well enough to leave her country for her sake. Thus, many have a value and affection for Christ, and yet come short of salvation by Him, because they cannot find in their hearts to forsake other things for Him. They love Him, and yet leave Him, because they do not love Him enough, but love other things better. Thus the young man went away from Christ, sorrowful Matt. 19: 22. But, (2.) Ruth clave unto her. Whether, when she came from home, she was resolved to go forward with her or no, does not appear; perhaps she was before determined what to do, out of a sincere affection to the God of Israel, and to his law, of which, by the good instructions of Naomi, she had some knowledge.

The sons, however, or other relations were bound to afford her an adequate maintenance, unless it had been otherwise arranged in the will. She sometimes returned back again to her father's house, particularly if the support which the heirs gave her, was not such as had been promised, or was not sufficient. See Gen. 38: 11.' JAHN.

15 And she said, Behold, thy sister-in-law [c] is gone back unto her people, and unto [d] her gods: [e] return thou after thy sister-in-law.

16 And Ruth said, [*] Entreat me not [f] to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for [g] whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: [h] thy people shall be my people, and [i] thy God my God.

6. Naomi persuades Ruth to go back, urging, as a further inducement, her sister's example, v. 15. Now, return; i. e. 'If ever thou wilt return, return now. This is the greatest trial of thy constancy; stand this trial, and thou art mine for ever.' Such offences as that of Orpah's revolt, must needs come, that they which are perfect and sincere, may be made manifest, as Ruth was on this occasion.

7. Ruth ends the debate, by a most solemn profession of her immovable resolution never to forsake her, v. 16, 17. Nothing could be said more fine, more brave, than this; she seems to have had another spirit, and another speech, now her sister was gone, and it is an instance of the grace of God, inclining the soul to the resolute choice of the better part. Draw me thus, and we will run after thee. Her mother's dissuasions make her the more resolute; as when Joshua said to the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord, they said it with the more vehemence, Nay, but we will.

(1.) She begs her mother-in-law to say no more against her going, v. 16. Note, It is a great vexation and uneasiness to those that are resolved for God and religion, to be tempted and solicited to alter their resolution. They that would not think of it, would not hear of it. Entreat me not. The margin reads, Be not against me. Note, We are to reckon those against us, and really our enemies, that would hinder us in our way to the heavenly Canaan Our relations they may be, but they cannot be our friends.

(2.) She is very particular in her resolution, and speaks the language of one resolved for God and heaven. She is so in love with her mother's wisdom, and virtue, and grace, which remained with her, even in her present poor and melancholy condition, that she resolves to cleave to her. [1.] She will travel with her; 'Whither thou goest I will go, though to a country I never saw, and which I have been trained up in a low and ill opinion of; though far from my own country, yet with thee every road shall be pleasant.' [2.] She will dwell with her; 'Where thou lodgest I will lodge, though it be a lodging no better than Jacob had, when he had the stones for his pillow.' [3.] She will unite interests with her, Thy people shall be my people. From Naomi's character she concludes certainly, that that great nation was a wise and understanding people; she judges of them all by her good mother, who, wherever she went, was a credit to her country, (as all those should study to be, who profess relation to the better country, i. e. the heavenly,) therefore she will think herself happy if she may be reckoned one of them. [4.] She will join in religion with her; thus she determined to be hers, to the very altars. I will adore the God of Israel, the only living and true God, trust in Him alone, serve Him, and in every thing be ruled by Him; this is to take the Lord for our God. [5.] She will gladly die in the same bed, Where thou diest will I die: she takes it for granted they must both die, and that, in all probability, Naomi, as the elder, would die first, and resolves to continue in the same house, if it might be, till her days also were fulfilled; intimating likewise a desire to partake of her happiness in death; she wishes to die in the same place, in token of her dying after the same manner. [6.] She will desire to be buried in the same grave, and to lay her bones by hers; There will I be buried; not desiring to have so much as her dead body carried back to the country of Moab, in token of any remaining kindness for it; but Naomi and she having joined souls, she desires they may mingle dust, in hopes of rising together, and being together for ever in the other world.

(3.) She backs her resolution to adhere to Naomi with a solemn oath, which was an ancient form of imprecation; this would leave a lasting obligation on her, never to forsake that good way. [1.] It is implied that death would separate between them for a time. A dying hour is a parting hour, and should be so thought of by us, and prepared for. [2.] It is resolved that nothing else should part them; kindness from her own people, or unkindness from Israel.

'I will never leave thee.'

Now this is a pattern of a resolute convert to God and religion; thus must we be at a point. We must take the Lord for our God. 'This God is my God for ever and ever: I have avouched Him for mine.' We must take his people for our people in all conditions; though poor and despised, yet, if they be his, they must be ours. We must be willing to fare as they fare; submit to the same yoke, and draw in it faithfully; take up the same cross, and carry it cheerfully; go where God would have us to go, lodge where He would have us to lodge, die where He will have us to die. We must resolve to continue and persevere, and herein our adherence to Christ must be closer than that of Ruth to Naomi; she resolved that nothing but death should separate them; but we must resolve that death itself shall not separate us from Christ, sure that then death itself shall not separate us from our happiness in Him. We must bind our souls with a bond never to break these pious resolutions, and swear unto the Lord that we will cleave to Him. Fast bind, fast find. He that means honestly, does not start at assurances.

Lastly, Naomi, when she saw she had gained her point, was well satisfied, and left off speaking. She could desire no more than that solemn protestation Ruth had just now made. See the power of resolution, how it puts temptation to silence. Those that are unresolved, and go in religious ways without a steadfast mind, tempt the tempter, and stand like a door half open, which invites a thief; but resolution shuts and bolts the door, resists the devil, and forces him to flee.

V. 14—22. Naomi and Ruth, after many a weary step, came at last to Beth-lehem very seasonably, in the beginning of the barley harvest, which was the first of their harvests, that of wheat following it. Now Naomi's own eyes might con-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. No judgment can be formed from mere outward circumstances, whether we have, or have not, 'found favor with God;' for whom He loves He often chastens for their profit, and leaves his enemies to be hardened in prosperity.—Those who, by inconveniences or hardships, are easily induced to change their situations, prove that they do not understand the real causes of their uneasiness. For the displeasure of God, and the pride and impatience of our hearts, cannot be avoided by change of place or situation; and while these remain, they will produce misery whithersoever we remove. Better would it be to be pinched with poverty, and worn down with labor, in the Lord's land, than to live in luxury and ease by hazarding the religion of those who depend on us. (Ps. 37: 3, 16, 17.) For our earthly trials or enjoyments are of short continuance; and we cannot too decidedly prefer those advantages which shall endure for ever. In every situation and relation in life, especially among such as are strangers to the truths of the Gospel, believers should aim to 'adorn the doctrine of God our Savior in all things.' (Tit. 2: 9, 10.) —Many feel an affection for such believers as have been kind to them, and entertain favorable sentiments of religion, who are not decided in renouncing all their worldly pleasures, connections, and prospects, and joining themselves to the poor and despised people of God, for the sake of Christ and his salvation.

vince her of what she had heard that the Lord had visited his people in giving them bread, and Ruth might see this good land in its best state; and now they had opportunity to provide for winter. Our times are in God's hands; both the events and the time of them.

Her old acquaintance gathered about her, to inquire after her state, and bid her welcome to Beth-lehem again; or perhaps, through fear lest she should be a charge to the town, she looked so bare. By this it appears she had formerly lived respectably, else she had not been so much noticed. Is this Naomi? The women of the city said it, for the word is feminine. They could scarcely believe her to be the same person they had formerly seen, so fresh, and fair, and gay; If any asked this question in contempt, upbraiding her with her miseries, their temper was very base and sordid: nothing more barbarous than to triumph over those that are fallen. But we may suppose the generality asked it in compassion and commiseration. Note, Afflictions will make great and surprising changes in a little time. God, by his grace, fit us for all such changes, especially the great change!

The composure of Naomi's spirit is noticed. If some upbraided her with her poverty, she was not moved against them, as she would have been, had she been poor and proud; but, with much pious patience, bore that and all the other melancholy effects of her affliction, v. 20, 21. Thus does she bring her mind to her condition, which we all ought to do, when our condition is not in every thing to our mind. Observe,

1. How her change of state is described, with a pious regard to the divine providence, without any passionate murmurings or complaints. (1.) She went out full; so she thought herself when she had her husband with her, and two sons. Much of the fulness of our comfort in this world arises from agreeable relations. But she now came home again empty, a widow, and childless; probably, she had sold her goods, and of all the effects she took with her, brought home no more than the clothes upon her. So uncertain is all we call fulness in the creature, 1 Sam. 2: 5. Even in the fulness of that sufficiency we may be in straits. But there is a fulness, a spiritual and divine fulness, we can never be emptied of; a good part which shall not be taken from those that have it. (2.) She acknowledges the hand of God, his mighty hand, in the affliction. Nothing conduces more to satisfy a gracious soul under an affliction, than the consideration of the hand of God in it. 1 Sam. 3: 18. Job 1: 21. Especially to consider, that He who afflicts us, is Shaddai, the Almighty, with whom it is folly to contend, and to whom it is our duty and interest to submit. It is that name of God by which He enters into covenant with his people, God All-sufficient, Gen. 17: 1. He afflicts as a God in covenant, and his all-sufficiency may be our support and supply under all our afflictions. He that emptics us of the creature, knows how to fill us with Himself. (3.) She speaks very feelingly of the impression the affliction had made on her; He has dealt very bitterly with me. The cup of affliction is a bitter cup; even that which afterward yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness, yet, for the present, is not joyous, but grievous. Job complains, Thou writest bitter things against me. (4.) She owns the affliction to come from God as a controversy; The Lord hath testified against me. Note, When God corrects us, He testifies against us, and contends with us, (Job 10: 17.) intimating that He is displeased with us. Every rod has a voice, the voice of a witness.

2. Many that are debased and impoverished, yet affect to be called by the empty names and titles of honor they have formerly enjoyed. Naomi did not so; her humility regards not a glorious name in a dejected state; if God deal bitterly with her, she accommodates herself to the dispensation, and is willing to be called Mara, bitter. Note, It well becomes us to have our hearts humbled under humbling providences. When our condition is brought down, our spirits should be brought down with it. And then our troubles are sanctified to us, when we thus comport with them; for it is not an affliction in itself, but an affliction rightly borne, that does us good. So many calamities have been lost upon you, if you have not yet learned how to suffer. Sen. ad Helv. Tribulation works patience.

CHAP. II.—There is scarcely a ch. in all the sacred history, that stoops so low as this, to take cognizance of so humble a person as Ruth, a poor Moabitish widow, so humble an action as her gleaning corn in a neighbor's field, and the minute circumstances thereof. But all this was in order to her being grafted into the line of Christ, and taken in among his ancestors, that she might be a figure of the espousals of the Gentile church to Christ, Is. 54: 1. And this makes the story remarkable; and many of the passages of it are instructive, and very improvable.

V. 1—3. Naomi had now gained a settlement in Bethlehem among her old friends; and here we have an account,

I. Of her rich kinsman, Boaz, v. 1. The Chaldee reads, mighty in the law; If he was both, it was a most rare and excellent conjunction; to be mighty in wealth, and mighty in the Scriptures too, is to be mighty indeed. He was grandson of Nahshon, prince of Judah in the wilderness, and son of Salmon, probably a younger son, by Rahab, the harlot of Jericho; he carries might in his name, Boaz, in him is strength; and he was of the family of Elimelech, now reduced so low. 1. Let not those that are great in the world, be ashamed to own their kindred that are poor and despised, lest they be

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—22. Nothing but a deep sense of the importance of eternal things, and a conviction of our guilt, and need of a Savior; nothing but that faith, which is inseparably connected with true repentance and hatred of sin, and which works by love of Christ, and his people, his truth, ordinances, and precepts; will, in such a world as this, carry a man through all possible temptations. Therefore the Lord proves those who profess themselves his disciples, by setting the consequences before them in his word, and by some experience of them in his providence.—We ought indeed greatly to desire the increase of true Christians; yet we should be cautious in our endeavors to multiply professors, lest we engage those who will betray the cause, which they are expected to defend. (Notes, Deut. 20: 5—9. Judg. 7: 2—7.) Especially we ought to examine, whether we ourselves are thus steadfastly minded, and determined to cast in our lot with the people of God, however poor, despised, or persecuted; and that living and dying, and for ever. We should inquire, whether this be our aim and prayer; whether the prospect of secular advantage have not some influence upon our minds; and whether, if that were withdrawn, or changed, we should not be tempted to draw back. But if we are thus decided in our judgment for the Lord, and his service and salvation, He will assuredly accept and provide for us; and while many 'draw back unto perdition, we shall believe unto the saving of our souls.' Verse 2.

Naomi was probably unable to endure the fatigue and heat of such an employment, as gleaning, and the Lord indeed intended other things for Ruth: but He was pleased thus to prove her sincerity, humility, industry, and patience; and her dutiful affection to Naomi for his sake. Orpah could not have stood this trial: but had she been assured of a settlement in Israel, as desirable as that which Ruth at length obtained, she would have come also, and have made a hypocritical profession of religion for the sake of secular advantage. found therein proud, scornful, and unnatural. 2. Naomi, though a poor, despised widow, had rich relations, whom yet she neither boasted of, nor was burdensome to, nor now expected any thing from. Poor people that have rich relations, ought to know that it is the wise providence of God that makes the difference, (in which we ought to acquiesce,) and that to be proud of our relation to such, is a great sin, and to trust to it, is great folly.

II. Ruth's condition was very low and poor; a great trial to the faith and constancy of a young proselyte. The Bethlehemites had done well, had they by turns invited Naomi and her daughter-in-law to their houses; (it would have been a great support to an aged widow, and a great encouragement to a new convert;) but, instead of tasting the dainties of Canaan, they have no way of getting necessary food, but by gleaning corn; and otherwise, for aught that appears, they might have starved. Note, God has chosen the poor of this world; and poor they are like to be, for though God has chosen them, commonly men overlook them. She had now a fair occasion to return to Moab again; but no, the God of Israel shall be her God, and though He slay her, yet will she trust in Him and never forsake Him. Her request is, Let me go to the field and glean. Those that are well born, and have been well brought up, know not what straits they may be reduced to, nor what employments they may be obliged to get their bread by, Lam. 4: 5. When the case is thus melancholy, let Ruth be remembered, who is a great example,

1. Of humility; when Providence had made her poor, she did not say, 'To glean, which is in effect to beg, I am ashamed;' but she cheerfully stoops to the meanness of her circumstances, and accommodates herself to her lot. High spirits can more easily starve than stoop; Ruth was none of those. She does not tell her mother she was never brought up to live on crumbs. Nay, it is her own motion, not her mother's injunction; humility is one of the brightest ornaments of youth, and one of the best omens. Before Ruth's honor was this humility. Observe, how humbly she speaks of herself, in her expectation of leave to glean; 'Let me glean after him, in whose sight I shall find grace:' that is, liberty to glean. Note, Poor people must not demand kindness as a debt, but humbly ask it, and take it as a favor, though in ever so small a matter. It becomes the poor to use entreaties.

2. Of industry. She does not say to her mother-in-law, 'Let me now go a visiting, or go a walking in the fields to take the air, and be merry, I cannot sit all day moping with you.' She was one of those virtuous women that love not to eat the bread of idleness. This is an example to young people; let them learn betimes to labor, and what their hands find to do, do it with their might; a disposition to diligence bodes well, both for this world and the other. Love not sleep, love not sport, love not sauntering, but love business. It is also an example to poor people to work for their living, and not beg that which they are able to earn. We must not be shy of any honest employment, though it be mean. Labor is no reproach. Sin is a thing below us, but we must not think any thing else so that Providence calls us to.

3. Of regard to her mother, though but her mother-in-law; being loosed by death from the law of her husband, she might easily suppose herself thereby loosed from the law of her husband's mother, yet she is dutifully observant of her. She will not go out without letting her know, and asking her leave. This respect young people ought to show to their parents and governors; it is a part of the honor due to them. She did not say, 'Mother, if you will go with me, I will go glean;' but, 'Do you sit at home, and take your ease, and I will go abroad, and take pains.' Youth should work. Let young people take advice from the aged, but not put them upon toil.

4. Of dependence on Providence; intimated in that, I will glean after him, in whose sight I shall find grace. She knows not which way to go, nor whom to inquire for, but will trust Providence to raise her up some friend or other that will be kind to her. Let us always keep up good thoughts of the divine providence, and believe, that while we do well, it will do well for us.

It did well for Ruth; her hap was to light on the field of Boaz, v. 3. To her it seemed casual, she knew not whose field it was, nor had she any reason for going to that more than any other, therefore it is said to be her hap; but Providence directed her steps. Note, God wisely orders small events; and those that seem altogether contingent, serve his own glory, and the good of his people. Many a great affair is brought about by a little turn, which seemed fortuitous to us, but was directed by Providence with design.

V. 4—16. Boaz himself appears, with great decency of carriage, both toward his own servants, and this poor stranger.

I. Toward his own servants, and the many employed for him in reaping and gathering in his corn, in busy harvest-time. Boaz is here an example of a good master.

1. He had a servant set over the reapers, v. 6. In great families, it is requisite there should be one to oversee the rest of the servants, and appoint to each their portion, both of work and meat. Ministers are such servants in God's house, and it is requisite they be both wise and faithful, and show their Lord all things, as he here, v. 6.

2. Yet he came himself, to see how the work went forward, if he found any thing amiss, to rectify it, and to give further orders. This was both for his interest, (the master's eye makes a fat horse,) and for the encouragement of his servants. Masters that live at ease, should think with tenderness of those that toil for them, and bear the burden and heat of the day.

3. Kind and pious salutations were interchanged between Boaz and his reapers, v. 4. Hereby they expressed, (1.) Their mutual respect; he to them as good servants, and they to him as a good master. He did not fall a chiding them, as if he came only to find fault and exercise his authority, but he prayed for them; 'The Lord be with you, prosper you, and give you health and strength, and preserve you from any disaster:' nor did they, as soon as ever he was out of hearing, fall a cursing him, as some ill-natured servants that hate their master's eye; but they returned his courtesy, 'The Lord bless thee, and make our labors serviceable to thy prosperity!' Things are likely to go on well

The LORD be with you.] Ps. 129: 6—8.—This emphatical expression occurs here for the first time in Scripture.—(M. R. f.)—The pious and affectionate language interchanged between Boaz and his reapers, and which appears to have been familiar to them, shows that there were many godly persons in Israel, notwithstanding national defections: and it beautifully illustrates the genuine effect of true religion, in producing affability in superiors, and respect and affection in inferiors, and mutual, unaffected good will in all.—It is lamentably true, that such language as this is seldom heard in our fields, while the bounty of Providence is gathering in: but frequently the reverse; yea, whatever can inflame the passions and corrupt the morals. So that a stranger, who should be occasionally present, would be apt to form a very different opinion respecting the religion of England, than Ruth did concerning that of Israel, from the conversation and conduct of Boaz and his reapers. ED.

When will the time arrive, that an employer shall go forth to his field, and give and receive these sensible salutations, without being accused of hypocrisy, and laughed at for singularity, and that too by Christians? That is, when will a universal reference of ourselves to the Almighty, in every act, become so much a habit of thought, feeling, and action to this nation, as to form the foundation and frame-work of our manners? Compare the insignificant salutations of our daily intercourse, the 'how d'ye dos' and 'how are yous,' with those of 'Boaz and his reapers.' Why is it so fashionable in these modern times to appear to be ashamed of God? How absurd and monstrous must such a state of general society be in the view of angels! ED.

Verses 5—10.

There is a beautiful simplicity in this narrative.—It seems evident, the same language was understood by all parties, whether Moab, as descended from Lot and Heber, retained the language of their ancestors, or a dialect of it; or whether Ruth had learned the language of Israel, in Elimelech's family. in a house where there is such good-will as this between masters and servants. (2.) Their joint dependence on the divine providence; they express their kindness to each other by praying one for another. They show not only their courtesy, but their piety, and an acknowledgment that all good comes from the presence and blessing of God, which therefore we should value and desire above any thing else, both for ourselves and others. Let us hence learn to use, [1.] Courteous salutations, as expressions of a sincere good-will to our friends. [2.] Pious ejaculations, lifting up our hearts to God for his favor, in such short prayers as these. Only, we must take heed that they do not degenerate into formality, lest in them we take the name of the Lord our God in vain; but if we be serious in them, we may in them keep up our communion with God, and fetch in mercy and grace from Him. It appears to have been the usual custom, thus to wish reapers good speed, Ps. 129: 7, 8.

4. He took an account from his reapers concerning a stranger he met with in the field, and gave necessary orders concerning her, that they should not touch her, v. 9. nor reproach her, v. 15. He also ordered them to be kind to her, and let fall some of the handfuls on purpose for her. Masters should not tie up their servants from being charitable, but give them allowance for that, with prudent directions.

II. Boaz was very kind to Ruth, and showed her a great deal of favor, induced to it by the report he had of her, and what he observed: God also inclining his heart to countenance her. Here is a very particular note of what passed concerning her.

1. The steward gave Boaz a very fair account, proper to recommend her, v. 6, 7. She was a stranger, therefore one of those that by the law of God were to gather the gleanings of the harvest, Lev. 19: 9, 10. she is the Moabitish damsel. She was allied to his family; she came back with Naomi, the wife of Elimelech, a kinsman of Boaz. She was a proselyte, for she came out of the country of Moab, to settle in the land of Israel. She was very modest, and had not gleaned till she had asked leave. She was very industrious, and had continued close to her work, from morning even until now: (the poor, if industrious and willing to take pains, are fit to be encouraged:) in the heat of the day, she tarried a little in the house, or booth, set up in the field, to repose herself, or, as some, for devotion; but she was soon back, and, except that, kept close to her work, all day, though it was not what she was used to. Servants should be just in the characters and reports they give to their masters, and take heed they do not misrepresent any person, nor without cause discourage their masters' charity.

2. Boaz was hereupon extremely civil to her. (1.) In ordering her to attend his reapers in every field they gathered in, for she should not need to go any where else to mend herself; (v. 8.) Abide here fast by my maidens; for those of her own sex were her fittest company. (2.) He charged all his servants to be very tender of her, and respectful to her, who, no doubt, would be so to one whom they saw their master kind to. (3.) He bid her welcome to the entertainment provided for his servants: ordered her, not only to drink of the water drawn for them, (for that seems to be the liquor he means, v. 9. from the famous well of Bethlehem, by the gate, the water David longed for, 2 Sam. 23: 15.) but at meal-time to come eat of their bread; (v. 14.) yea, and she should be welcome to their sauce too, Come dip thy morsel in the vinegar, to make it savory; for God allows us, not only nourishing but relishing food, not for necessity only, but for delight. And, for encouragement to her, and direction to the servants, he himself, happening to be present when the reapers sat down to meat, reached her parched corn to eat. It is no disparagement to the finest hand, to be reached forth to the needy, and to be employed in serving the poor. Observe, Boaz was not scanty in his provision for his reapers, but sent them so much more than enough for themselves as would be entertainment for a stranger. Thus there is that scattereth, and yet increaseth. (4.) He commended her for her dutiful respect to her mother-in-law, which, though he did not know her by sight, yet he had heard of, v. 11. Note, Those that do well, ought to have the praise of it. But what especially he commended her for, was, that she had left her own country, and was become a proselyte to the Jewish religion; for so the Chaldee expounds it. Those that leave all, to embrace true religion, are worthy of double honor. (5.) He prayed for her; v. 12. The Lord recompense thy work. Her strong affection to the commonwealth of Israel, to which she was by birth an alien, was such a work of divine grace in her, as would certainly be crowned with a full reward by Him under whose wings she was come to trust: the Jews describe a proselyte to be one that is gathered under the wings of the divine majesty; and those who by faith come under these wings may be sure of a full recompense of reward for so doing. Lastly, He encouraged her to go on in her gleaning, and did not offer to take her off from that: for the greatest kindness we can do our poor relations, is, to assist and encourage their industry. Boaz ordered his servants to let her glean among the sheaves, where other gleaners were not allowed to come, and not to reproach her, i. e. call her thief, or to suspect her of taking more than was allowed her, v. 15. All this shows Boaz to have been a man of a generous spirit, and one that, according to the law, considered the heart of a stranger.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. The distinctions we are apt to form concerning the persons and affairs of men, do not comport with the judgment of the Lord: the gleaning of a poor Moabitess, who trusted in Him, was deemed more worthy of his condescending notice, than the transactions of the greatest princes then living, which are now almost entirely consigned to oblivion! We ought not therefore to 'mind high things, but to condescend to men of low estate.'—True religion will teach men to behave with propriety in every circumstance and relation of life.—With what gratitude to God and liberality to the poor, should the bounty of a kind Providence be received by us unworthy sinners! and how inexcusable are those who abuse plenty in intemperance, or covetously neglect the indigent, or allow themselves in wickedness, when they are thus experiencing the goodness of the Lord!—In showing kindness to the destitute, we ought ourselves to avoid, and try to prevent in others, every thing that may appear like reproaching them: for a generous mind in distress has very exquisite sensibilities.

Verses 11, 12.

(Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 23: 37—39.) In all ages and nations, conversion is substantially the same: irreligion or false religion is exchanged for the spiritual worship of the true God, through the appointed Mediator, and in his instituted ordinances; the practice of sin, for the pursuit of true holiness; self-dependence, for reliance in every thing on the mercy, grace, and providence of God; the expectation of felicity from the world, for his favor as our portion; and the company of the workers of iniquity, for the society of those who love and serve Him. But many circumstances depend on men's outward situation. Such as have godly parents and relations, are engaged in lawful and useful employments, and live in peaceable times, will not be immediately required to make the same sacrifices, as those who are called out of the families of imbittered opposers, from occupations inconsistent with the precepts of Scripture, or in times of furious persecution. The more, however, men venture, renounce, or suffer for the Lord's sake, the clearer evidence they have, that their faith is genuine, and that they shall 'receive a full reward.' The principle and the precept are in all cases alike; but the application varies, according as different trials are allotted in the providence of God. (Heb. 11: 8—10, 24—26.) SCOTT.

13 Then she said, * Let me find favor in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken † friendly unto thine handmaid, though I be [a] not like unto one of thine handmaidens.

14 And Boaz said unto her, [b] At meal-time come thou hither, and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar. And she sat beside the reapers: and he reached her [c] parched corn, and [d] she did eat, and was sufficed, and left.

15 And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, saying, Let her glean even among the sheaves, and ‡ reproach her not:

16 And [e] let fall also some of the handfuls of purpose for her, and leave them, that she may glean them, and rebuke her not.

17 So [f] she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned: and it was about an [g] ephah of barley.

18 And she took it up, and went into the city; and her mother-in-law saw what she had gleaned: and she brought forth, and gave to her that [h] she had reserved, after she was sufficed.

3. Ruth received his favors with great humility and gratitude, and conducted herself with as much propriety in her place, as he in his, little thinking she should shortly be the mistress of the field she was now gleaning in. (1.) She paid all possible respect to him, according to the usage of the country, v. 10. Note, Good breeding is a great ornament to religion; and we must render honor to whom honor is due. (2.) She humbly owned herself unworthy of his favors; I am a stranger, (v. 10.) and not like one of thy handmaidens; (v. 13.) not so well dressed, nor so well taught: not so neat, nor so handy. Note, It well becomes us all to think meanly of ourselves, and to notice that in ourselves, which is diminishing, esteeming others better than ourselves. (3.) She gratefully acknowledged his kindness to her; though no great expense to him, nor much more than what he was obliged to by the divine law, yet she magnifies and admires it, v. 10. (4.) She begs the continuance of his good-will, v. 13. and owns that what he had said, had been a cordial to her. Those that are great, and in high places, know not how much good they may do to their inferiors with a kind look, or by speaking friendly to them; and so small an expense, one would think, they should not grudge, when it shall be put upon the score of their charity. (5.) When Boaz gave her her dinner with his reapers, she did not, under pretence either of her want, or of her labor, eat more than was convenient, and so unfit her for work in the afternoon, but only so much as would suffice, leaving the rest, and rising up immediately to glean, v. 14, 15. Temperance is a friend to industry; and we must eat and drink to strengthen us for business, not to indispose us to it. [See on Jude, v. 12.]

V. 17—23. Here, I. Ruth finishes her day's work, v. 17. 1. She took care not to lose time, for she gleaned until even. We must not be weary of well-doing, because in due season we shall reap. She scarcely used, much less abused the kindness of Boaz, he ordered his servants to leave handfuls for her, but she still gleaned the scattered ears. 2. She took care not to lose what she had gathered, Prov. 12: 27. She had gathered it ear by ear, but altogether, it was an ephah, about four pecks. It is an encouragement to industry, that in all labor, even that of gleaning, there is profit; but the talk of the lips tendeth only to penury. She, herself, carried her corn into the city, though, had she asked them, it is likely some of Boaz's servants would have done that for her. We should study to be as little as possible troublesome to those that are kind to us.

II. She paid her respects to her mother-in-law; went straight home to her, and did not go to converse with Boaz's servants; showed her what she had gleaned, that she might see she had not been idle.

1. She entertained her with what she had left of the good dinner Boaz gave her, v. 18. which refers to v. 14. If she had any thing better than another, her mother should have part with her. Thus, having showed industry abroad, she showed piety at home; so children's maintaining of their parents is called, (1 Tim. 5: 4.) and it is part of the honor due to them by the fifth commandment, Mat. 15: 6.

2. She gave her an account of her day's work, and how a kind Providence had favored her in it, which made it very comfortable to her; for the gleanings that a righteous man hath, are better than the harvests of many wicked, Ps. 37: 16.

(1.) Naomi asked her where she had gleaned. Note, Parents should inquire into the ways of their children, how, where, and in what company they spend their time. This may prevent many extravagances which children, left to themselves, run into, by which they bring both themselves and their parents to shame. If not our brethren's, surely we are our children's keepers: and we know what a son Adonijah proved, that never had been chidden. Parents should examine their children, not to frighten or discourage them, so as to make them hate home, or tempt them to tell a lie, but to commend them if they have done well, and with mildness to reprove and caution them if they have done otherwise. It is a good question for us to ask ourselves in the close of every day, 'Where have I gleaned to-day? What improvements have I made in knowledge and grace? What have I done or gotten, that will turn to a good account?'

(2.) Ruth gave her a particular account of the kindness of Boaz, (v. 19.) and her hopes of further kindness from him, v. 21. Note, Children should consider themselves accountable to their parents, and to those that are over them, and not think it a disparagement to be examined. Ruth told her mother what kindness Boaz had showed her, that she might take occasion to acknowledge it, and return him thanks; but she did not tell her how Boaz had commended her, v. 11. Humility teaches us, not only not to praise ourselves, but not to be forward to publish others' praises of us.

(3.) Hereupon, [1.] Naomi prayed heartily for her daughter's benefactor, even before she knew who it was, (v. 19.) shooting the arrow of prayer at a venture. But more particularly, when she was told who it was, v. 20. Note, The poor must pray for those that are kind and liberal to them, and thus requite them, when not capable of any other requital. Let the loins of the poor bless those that refresh them. And He that hears the cries of the poor against their oppressors, (Ex. 22: 27.) it may be hoped, will hear the prayers of the poor for their benefactors. She now remembered the former kindnesses Boaz had showed her husband and sons, and joins those to this; he has not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead.

[2.] She acquainted Ruth with their family relation to Boaz. It should seem she had been so long in Moab, she had forgotten her kindred in Israel, till by this providence God brought it to her mind. At least, she had not encouraged Ruth

CHAP. III.

By Naomi's instruction Ruth lies down in the night at the feet of Boaz, 1—7. He acknowledges that he owes the duty of a kinsman, but shows that another has a prior claim, 8—13. He sends her away in the morning with six measures of barley, and she confers with Naomi, 14—18.

THEN Naomi her mother-in-law said unto her, My daughter, [a] shall I not seek rest for thee, that it [b] may be well with thee?

with it; so unlike was humble Naomi to many, who, though fallen into decay themselves, are continually boasting of their great relations. Nay, observe the chain of thought here, and in it a chain of providences, bringing about what was designed concerning Ruth. Ruth names Boaz as one that had been kind to her; and that reminds Naomi who he was; 'He is our next kinsman; our Goel, who has the right to redeem our mortgaged estate, from whom therefore we may expect further kindness. That is the likeliest man in all Bethlehem to set us up.' Thus God brings things to our mind, sometimes of a sudden, that prove to have a wonderful tendency to our good.

[3.] She appointed Ruth to continue her attendance in the fields of Boaz, (v. 22.) 'Let them not meet thee in any other field, for that will be construed a contempt of his courtesy.' Has the Lord dealt bountifully with us? Let us not be found in any other field, nor seek for happiness and satisfaction in the creature. Tradesmen take it ill, if those that are in their books, go to another shop. We lose divine favors, if we slight them. Some think Naomi gave her daughter-in-law a tacit rebuke; (v. 21, 22.) but they are too critical: Ruth spake of the young men, because they were the principal laborers, and to them Boaz had given directions concerning her; and Naomi takes it for granted, while she attended the young men, her society would be with the maidens, as was fit. Ruth dutifully obeyed. And when the harvest was ended, (as Patrick expounds it,) she did not gad abroad, but kept her aged mother company at home. Dinah went out to see the daughters of the land, and we know what disgrace her vanity ended in; Ruth kept at home, and helped to maintain her mother, and went out on no other errand than to get provision for her; and we shall find afterward what preferment her humility and industry ended in, Seest thou a man diligent in his business? Honor is before him.

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. We found it very easy, in the former ch. to applaud the decency of Ruth's behavior, and to show what good use we may make of the account given us of it; but, in this ch. we shall have much ado to vindicate it from the imputation of indecency, and to save it from having an ill use made of it; but the goodness of those times was such, as saves what is recorded here from being [accounted] ill done; and yet the badness of these times is such, as that it will not justify any now in doing the like.

I. Naomi's care for her daughter's comfort, is, without doubt, very commendable, and recorded for imitation. She had no thoughts of marrying, herself, (ch. 1: 12.) for she was old, yet she would not restrain her daughter-in-law, that was young. Age must not make itself a standard to youth. On the contrary, she is full of contrivance how to get her well married. Her wisdom projected that for her daughter, which her daughter's modesty forbade her to project for herself, v. 1. This she did, 1. In justice to the dead, to preserve the family from being extinct. 2. In kindness and gratitude to her daughter-in-law, who had conducted herself very dutifully and respectfully to her, that she might live plentifully and pleasantly, and not spend all her days in the low and melancholy condition she now lived in. Note, (1.) A married state is, or should be, a state of rest to young people; wandering affections are then fixed, and the heart must be at rest: it is at rest in the house of a husband, and in his heart, ch. 1: 9. Those are giddy indeed, that marriage does not compose. (2.) Those that marry should desire it may be well with them; in order to which, they must choose well; otherwise, instead of rest, it may prove the greatest uneasiness. Parents, in disposing of their children, must have this in their eye, that it may be well with them. And be it always remembered, That is best for us, which is best for our souls. (3.) Parents should seek this rest for their children, and do all that is fit for them to do, in due time, in order to it. And the more dutiful and respectful they are to them, though they can the worse spare them, yet they should the rather prefer them, and the better.

II. The course she took, in order to her daughter's preferment, was very extraordinary, and looks suspicious. If there was any thing improper in it, the fault must lie on Naomi, who put her daughter upon it, and who knew, or should know, the laws and usages of Israel better than Ruth. 1. It was true, Boaz, being near of kin to the deceased, and (for aught that Naomi knew to the contrary) the nearest of all now alive, was obliged by the divine law to marry the widow of Mahlon, who was the eldest son of Elimelech, and was dead without issue, v. 2. 2. It was a convenient time to remind him of it, now that he had got so much acquaintance with Ruth, by her constant attendance on his reapers during harvest; and he also, by the kindness he had showed to Ruth in less matters, had encouraged Naomi to hope he would not be unkind, much less unjust, in this greater matter. And she thought it a good opportunity to apply to him, when he made a winnowing-feast at his threshing-floor, (v. 2.) completing the joy of the harvest, and treating his workmen like a kind master; as Nabal and Absalom at their sheep-shearing. 3. Naomi thought Ruth the most proper person to do it herself; and perhaps it was the usage in that country, that in this case the woman should make the demand, so much is intimated by the law, Deut. 25: 7—9. Naomi therefore orders her daughter-in-law to make herself neat, not fine; (v. 3.) 'Wash thyself and anoint, not paint thee; (as Jezebel;) put on thy raiment, but not the attire of the harlot, and go down to the floor,' whither, probably, she was invited to the supper there made; but she must not make herself known, i. e. not make her errand known, (she herself could not but be very well known among Boaz's reapers,) till the company was dispersed, and Boaz was retired. And,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—23. All persons should be careful what connections they form, and what places they frequent; but especially young women, both for conscience' and credit's sake.—In the path of duty is safety; and we should keep close to those employments and situations, in which the Lord has blessed us, without being desirous of change, or fearful of loss, or want of support.—A tender concern for each other's welfare, affectionate and edifying conversation, with true piety and contentment, will render the lowest circumstances and the meanest fare comfortable.—But to accommodate this subject, ought not parents to ask their children what they have gleaned from the sermons which they have heard, the books which they have read, and the conversation they have joined in? May we not also ask ourselves the same question? He that would increase in wisdom must be always thus gleaning, and call himself frequently to account respecting it; determining, if possible, to get some profitable hint from every person and occurrence. And those, who thus daily collect knowledge from others, and keep close to the word and ordinances of God, will become 'thoroughly furnished for every good work.'—Finally, let us, in the kindness of Boaz to Ruth, contemplate the kindness of Jesus to poor sinners; to whose meanness He most freely condescends; on whom, though most unworthy, He liberally confers his benefits; and whom He neither upbraids Himself, nor suffers others to upbraid, with their former transgressions. If Ruth had gone into any other field to glean, it would have seemed an evidence of an inconstant temper of mind, which might have given Boaz and his family an unfavorable opinion of her. NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—6. The law, concerning a man's marrying his brother's widow when he died childless, was by custom extended, as it seems, to the other near relations, when there were no brethren:

2 And now [c] is not Boaz of our kindred, with whose maidens thou wast? behold, he winnoweth barley to-night in the threshing-floor.

3 Wash thyself therefore, and [d] anoint thee, and [e] put thy raiment upon thee, and get thee down to the floor: but make not thyself known unto the man, until he shall have done eating and drinking.

4 And it shall be, when he lieth down, that thou shalt mark the place where he shall lie, and thou shalt go in, and * uncover his feet, and lay thee down; and he will tell thee what thou shalt do.

5 And she said unto her, All that thou sayest unto me I will do.

6 And she went down unto the floor, [f] and did according to all that her mother-in-law bade her.

7 And when Boaz had eaten and drunk, and [g] his heart was merry, he went to lie down at the end of the heap of corn: and she came softly, and uncovered his feet, and laid her down.

8 And it came to pass at midnight, that the man was afraid, and † turned himself; and, behold, a woman lay at his feet.

on this occasion, she would have an easier access to him in private, than she could have at his own house. And thus far was well enough. But, 4. Her coming to lie at his feet, when he was asleep in his bed, had such an appearance of evil, was such a dangerous approach towards it, and might have been such occasion of it, that we know not well how to justify it. Many expositors think it unjustifiable, particularly the excellent Mr. Poole. We must not do evil that good may come. All agree it is not to be drawn into a precedent; neither our laws [our manners] nor our times are the same that were then; yet I am willing to make the best of it. If Boaz was, as they presumed, the next kinsman, she was his wife before God, (as we say,) and there needed but little ceremony to complete the nuptials; and Naomi did not intend that Ruth should approach to him any otherwise than as his wife; she knew Boaz to be not only an old man, (she would not have trusted to that alone in venturing her daughter-in-law so near him,) but a grave, sober man, a virtuous and religious man, and one that feared God. She knew Ruth to be a modest woman, chaste, and a keeper at home. Naomi herself designed nothing but what was honest and honorable, and her charity (which believeth all things and hopeth all things) banished and forbade all suspicion, that either Boaz or Ruth would offer any thing but what was likewise honest and honorable. If what she advised, had been then as indecent and immodest (according to the usage of the country) as it seems now to us, we cannot think, that if Naomi had had so little virtue, (which yet we have no reason to suspect,) that she should have had so little wisdom, as to put her daughter upon it, since that alone might have marred the match, and have alienated the affections of so grave and good a man as Boaz from her. We must therefore think the thing did not look so ill then as it does now. Naomi referred her daughter-in-law to Boaz for further directions. When she had thus made her claim, Boaz, who was more learned in the laws, would tell her what she must do.

We may be sure, if Ruth had apprehended any evil in what her mother advised her to, she was a woman of too much virtue, and too much sense, to promise as she did, (v. 5.) All that thou sayest unto me I will do. Thus must the younger submit to the elder, and to their grave and prudent counsels, when they have nothing worth speaking of to object against it.

V. 6—13. Here is, 1. Boaz's good management of his common affairs; it is probable, according to the common usage, 1. When his servants winnowed, he was with them, to prevent, not their stealing, (he had no reason to fear that,) but their waste, through carelessness in winnowing. Masters may sustain great losses by heedless though honest servants, which is a reason why men should be diligent to know the state of their own flocks, and look well to them. 2. When he had more than ordinary work to be done, he treated his servants with extraordinary entertainments, and, for their encouragement, did eat and drink with them. It well becomes the rich and great, to be generous to, and also familiar with, those that are under them, and employed for them. 3. When Boaz had supped with his workmen, and been a while pleasant with them, he went to bed in due time, so early, that by midnight he had his first sleep, (v. 8.) thus he would be fit for his business betimes next morning. Good husbands will keep good hours, and not indulge themselves or their families in unseasonable mirth. The Chaldee paraphrase tells us, (v. 7.) his heart was good, (and so the Heb. is,) and he blessed the name of the Lord, who had heard his prayers, and taken away the famine from the land of Israel. So he went sober to bed, his heart was in a good frame, and not overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness. Nor did he go to bed without prayer; and it was well, for he had an unusual temptation before him, though he knew it not. 4. He laid at the end of the heap of corn; that he might be near his work, and ready for it next morning, and show that, like his father Jacob, he was a plain man, that, on occasion, could make his bed in a barn, and, if need were, sleep contentedly in the straw.

II. Ruth observed her mother's orders, went and laid her down, not by his side, but over-cross his feet, in her clothes, and kept awake, waiting for an opportunity to tell her errand. When he awaked in the night, and perceived there was somebody at his feet, and inquired who it was, she told him her name, and then her errand, (v. 9.) that she came to put herself under his protection, as the person appointed by the divine law to be her protector. 'Spread thy skirt over me, be pleased to espouse me and my cause.' See

The good acceptance Ruth gained. What she did had no ill effect, so Naomi was not mistaken in her good opinion of her kinsman. He knew her demand was just and honorable, and treated her accordingly. Boaz knew it was not any sinful lust brought her thither, and therefore maintained both his own honor and hers. He did not put any ill construction on what she did, did not reproach her as impudent, and unfit to make an honest man a wife; she having approved herself well in the fields, and all her conduct having been modest and decent, he would not, from this instance, entertain the least suspicion of her character, or seem to do so; perhaps blaming himself that he had not offered the service of a kinsman to these distressed widows, and saved her this trouble, and ready to say as Judah concerning his daughter-in-law, She is more righteous than I. He says, (v. 10.) Thou hast showed more kindness in the latter end, than at the beginning, ch. 2: 11. in that she consulted not her own fancy, but her husband's family, in marrying again. She received not the addresses of young men (much less did she seek them) whether poor or rich, but was willing to marry as the law directed, though to an old man, because it was for the honor and interest of the family into which she had matched, and for which she had an entire kindness. Young people must aim, in disposing of themselves, not so much to please their own eye, as to please God and their parents.

He promised her marriage, v. 11. Note, [1.] Exemplary virtue ought to have its due praise, (Phil. 4: 8.) and it will recommend both men and women to the esteem of the wisest and best. Poverty often obscures the lustre of virtue: yet Ruth's virtues, even in a mean condition, were generally and it required the woman to do several things, widely different from modern usages. (Deut. 25: 5—10.) This law gave Ruth, now proselyted to the true religion, a legal claim upon Boaz, as Naomi supposed; who either did not know of another nearer kinsman, or was aware that it would be in vain to apply to him. (Note, 4: 1—8.) It was customary for widows to assert this claim; and, considering Boaz's character and superiority of station, she supposed that this was best done in a private manner. When all allowances are made, perhaps neither party can be entirely exculpated. Though their plan was graciously rendered successful, it was not recorded for imitation in the present state of society; nor must it be judged of by modern customs and maxims. (M. R.) Scott.

Patrick* and Hewlett think, they were covered at top and closed by doors at night, though open on all sides by day; but no rain fell in harvest time in Palestine, and it is common now to sleep in the open air there. 'The sun,' observes Roberts, 'is so hot and pernicious, in the east, that many farmers plough and irrigate their fields and gardens long after it has set, or before it rises. The wind also is generally stronger in the night, which might induce Boaz to prefer it.' Ed.

(3.) Down to the floor.] 'Some place near it, where she might see what was done and not be observed.' Patrick.—But Poole thinks she was, with Boaz's laborers, invited to the feast: hence he infers a reason why she should wash, anoint, and dress neatly, which, otherwise, there could be no object in her doing, as she was to go by night, when she could not be seen. Her not making herself known also, he understands to relate only to the business she was sent upon, which she was not to make known till after the feast. Id.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The word of God has pronounced 'marriage honorable in all;' and therefore those who choose to abide in a single state, should not condemn those, who prefer a married life. If they are imprudent, they 'will have trouble in the flesh: but their brethren should spare them,' and not censure what the divine law does not condemn. (1 Cor. 7: 25—28. 1 Tim. 5: 13—15.)—The more willing any one is, for conscience' sake, to renounce worldly interests, the greater care should others employ in promoting his advantage.—But good intentions will not justify improper means; and it is well for us, that we have to do with a God of mercy, who takes better care of our interest, purity, credit, and peace, than we often do of our own and of each other's.—Parents should be very cautious what injunctions they lay upon their children; lest filial affection and deference should ensnare their consciences, and lead them into temptation: for the authority even of a parent will not justify a sinful action.—Few men have such command of their passions, and candor of mind, as to injure neither the virtue nor the reputation of females, who indiscreetly put themselves in their way: and yet to take advantage of a woman's affection and confidence, for her irreparable detriment, is much baser than defrauding those who implicitly trust in us. They, however, who value either their chastity or their character, should flee from such situations; in which they can be preserved only by the same Power, that preserved the young men in the fiery furnace.—All our plenty should be shared with the poor and industrious: and all our feasting should be so moderated, that it may neither unfit us for our ordinary employments, nor for the exercises of devotion. When, in such circumstances, men can retain the dominion over their passions, and conduct themselves with tenderness, prudence, piety, justice, and regard to the law of God, their wealth may be pronounced blessed, and their use of it honorable.—We must not, however, rest satisfied even with a clear conscience in the sight of God; but should endeavor to preserve a clear character, and to avoid whatever may occasion slander, or excite suspicion: (2 Cor. 8: 20, 21. 1 Thes. 5: 22.) and we ought to be as tender of the reputation of others as of our own.—But without any impropriety, we poor polluted sinners may apply to Jesus Christ, to take us under his almighty care; and when we have applied to Him, He will not rest till He has accomplished our desires; while in the meantime He will communicate blessings to us and ours, in answer to our prayers: nor can we too earnestly desire and seek this same rest for our children and friends, that it may be well with them also. CHAP. IV.

Boaz proposes to the kinsman, of whom he had spoken, to redeem Elimelech's land, and to marry Ruth; which he declines to do, 1—8. Boaz buys the inheritance and marries Ruth, 9—12. She bears Obed, the grandfather of David, 13—17. The genealogy from Pharez to David, 18—22.

THEN went Boaz up [a] to the gate, and sat him down there: and, behold, [b] the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by; unto whom he said, [c] Ho, such a one, turn aside, sit down here. And he turned aside, and sat down.

2 And he took ten men of [d] the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here. And they sat down.

3 And [e] he said unto the kinsman, Naomi that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land which was our brother Elimelech's:

4 And * I thought to advertise thee, saying, [f] Buy it [g] before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it; but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: [h] for there is none to redeem it beside thee; and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it.

5 Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, [i] to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance.

scious of an unspotted purity, but because few could have come so near the fire as they did, and not be scorched. Had it been known, it would have occasioned suspicions in some, and reflection from others; good people would have been troubled, and bad people would have triumphed, therefore let it not be known. Note, We must always take care, not only to keep a good conscience, but a good name: either we must not do that, which, though innocent, is liable to be misinterpreted, or if we do, we must not let it be known. We must avoid not only sin, but scandal. There was likewise a particular reason for concealment here; if this matter should take wind, it might prejudice the freedom of the other kinsman's choice, and he would make this his reason for refusing Ruth, that Boaz and she had been together. 2. He dismissed her with a good present of corn, which would be very acceptable to her poor mother at home, and an evidence that he had not sent her away in dislike, which Naomi might have suspected, had he sent her away empty. He gave it her in her veil, or apron, or mantle; gave it her by measure; like a prudent corn master, he kept an account of all he delivered out; it was six measures, i. e. six omers, as is supposed, ten of which made an ephah; whatever the measure was, probably he gave her as much as she could well carry, v. 15.

II. How she was welcomed by her mother-in-law. She asked her, 'Who art thou, my daughter? A bride or no? Must I give thee joy?' So Ruth told her how the matter stood, v. 16, 17. Whereupon her mother, 1. Advised her to be satisfied in what was done; Sit still, my daughter, till thou know how the matter will fall, v. 18. How it is decreed in heaven, the Chaldee reads, for marriages are made there. She had done all that was fit for her to do, and now must patiently wait the issue, and not be perplexed about it. Let us learn hence to cast our care on providence, to follow that, and attend the motions of it, composing ourselves into an expectation of the event, with a resolution to acquiesce in it, whatever it be; sometimes that proves best done for us, that is least our own doing. 2. She assured her that Boaz, having undertaken this matter, would approve himself a faithful, careful friend; He will not be at rest, till he have finished it. Though it was a busy time with him in the fields and the floor, yet having undertaken to serve his friend, he would not neglect the business. Much more reason have good Christians to be careful for nothing, but cast their care on God, because He has promised to care for them. 'Sit still and see how the matter will fall, for the Lord will perfect that which concerns thee, and will make it to work for good to thee.' Ps. 37: 4, 5.—138: 8. Your strength is to sit still, Isa. 30: 7.

CHAP. IV. In this ch. we have the wedding between Boaz and Ruth, in the circumstances of which there was something uncommon, which is kept on record, for the illustration, not only of the law concerning the marrying of a brother's widow, (Deut. 25: 5, &c. cases help to expound laws,) but of the gospel too, for from this marriage descended David, and the Son of David, whose espousals to the Gentile church were hereby typified. So the book concludes with the pedigree of David, v. 18—22. Perhaps, to oblige him, the blessed Spirit directed the insertion of this story in the sacred canon, he being desirous the virtues of his great-grandmother, Ruth, together with her Gentile extraction, should be transmitted to posterity, and the singular providence that attended her.

V. 1—8. Here, 1. Boaz calls a court immediately. Probably he was himself one of the elders (or aldermen) perhaps the father of the city, for he seems here to have gone up to the gate, as one having authority, and not as a common person: like Job, ch. 29: 7, &c. We cannot suppose him less than a magistrate. But why so hasty, why so fond of the match? Ruth was not rich, but lived on alms; not honorable, but a poor stranger; never said to be beautiful; and if ever so, weeping, and travelling, and gleaning, had now withered her lilies and roses. It was, then, that all her neighbors agreed she was a virtuous woman; this set her price with him far above rubies. Therefore, he thinks, if, by marrying her, he might do her a kindness, he should also do himself a greater; he will therefore bring it to a conclusion immediately. It was not court-day, but he got ten men of the elders of the city to meet him in the [open place, by the] gate, where public business used to be transacted, v. 2. So many, it is probable, by the custom of the city, made a full court. Boaz, though a judge, would not be a judge in his own cause, but desired the concurrence of other elders. Honest intentions dread not a public cognizance.

2. He summons his rival to come and hear the matter that was to be proposed to him; (v. 1.) 'Ho, such a one, sit down here.' He called him by his name, no doubt, but the divine historian thought not fit to record it.

3. He proposes to this kinsman the redemption of Naomi's land, which, it is probable, had been mortgaged for money to buy bread during the famine; (v. 3.) 'Naomi has a parcel of land to sell, namely, the equity of the redemption of it out of the hands of the mortgagee, which she is willing to part with;' or, as some think, it was her jointure for life, and wanting money, she would for a small matter sell her interest to the heir at law, who was the fittest to be a purchaser. This he gives the kinsman legal notice of, (v. 4.) that he might have the refusal of it. Boaz, though fond enough of the purchase, would not do so mean a thing, as to take a bargain over another's head; and we are taught, by his example, to be not only just and honest, but fair and honorable, in all our dealings, and to do nothing which we are unwilling should see the light, but be above-board.

4. The kinsman seemed forward to redeem the land, (v. 4.) till told, that if he did, he must marry the widow, and then he flew off. He liked the land well enough, and, probably, caught at that the more greedily, because he hoped the poor widow being under a necessity of selling, he might have so much the better bargain. But Boaz told him there was a young widow in the case, and if he have the land, he must take her with it: The estate passes with this encumbrance: either the divine law or the usage of the country would oblige him to it, or Naomi insisted she should not sell the land, but on this condition, v. 5. Some think this does not relate to that law of marrying the brother's widow, (for that seems to oblige only the children of the same father, (Deut. 25: 5.) unless by custom it was afterward made to extend to the next of kin,) but refers to the law of redemption of inheritances, (Lev. 25: 24, 25.) for a Goel, a redeemer, is here inquired for; and if so, it was not by law, but by Naomi's own resolution, that the purchaser was to marry the widow. He refused,

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—8. Considerable difficulties arise, in explaining this transaction consistently with the laws before given; and indeed it does not appear in whose possession the estate of Elimelech was at this time. It is however probable, that it had been sold till the year of jubilee: (Lev. 25: 14—17. 25—28.) and as Elimelech had no male issue surviving, and it could not be alienated from his family, the nearest relation would have a right to redeem it, by repaying the proportion of the purchase-money; except as Ruth, Elimelech's daughter-in-law, was entitled to his inheritance, according to the law given in the case of those who left daughters only. (Num. 27: 1—11.)—To obviate therefore all doubt and difficulty in this matter, Boaz proposed to this kinsman of Elimelech, that he should both redeem the estate and marry Ruth; in which case the estate would certainly belong to his eldest son by her: but if he was unwilling to do it, he desired him to renounce his claim, and he would marry her, and redeem the land for himself. This transaction respects all the several laws above referred to; and doubtless the whole was settled in the most regular, legal, and customary manner.—The manner in which Boaz brought forward this business, evinced a strict regard to openness, fairness, and equity; and also an affection for Ruth, whom it is evident he was desirous of marrying, provided the kinsman was willing to relinquish his prior claim. v. 6. Perhaps he thought it would be a disparagement to him to marry such a poor widow from a strange country; that her eminent virtues were not sufficient in his eye to balance this; or, he had another wife, and if he should take Ruth, it might occasion strife and contention in his family; (so the Chaldee;) or, he thought she might bring him a great many children, and they would all expect shares of his estate, which would scatter it too much, so that his family would make the less figure. So, many refuse the great redemption; they are not willing to espouse religion; they have heard well of it, and have nothing to say against it; they will give it their good word, but at the same time are willing to part with it, and cannot be bound for it, for fear of marring their own inheritance in this world. Heaven they could be glad of, but holiness they can dispense with; it will not agree with the lusts they have already espoused, therefore let who will purchase heaven at that rate, they cannot.

5. The right of redemption is fairly resigned to Boaz. In those ancient times it was not the usage to pass estates by writings, as afterwards, (Jer. 32: 10, &c.) but by some sign or ceremony, as with us by livery and seisin; that is, the delivery of seisin, seisin of a house by giving the key, of land by giving turf and a twig. The ceremony here used, was, he that surrendered, plucked off his shoe, (the Chaldee says, the glove of his right hand,) and gave it to him to whom he made the surrender, intimating thereby, that whatever right he had to tread or go upon the land, he conveyed and transferred it, on a valuable consideration, to the purchaser; this was a testimony in Israel; v. 7. and it was done in this case, v. 8. If this kinsman was obliged by the law to marry Ruth, and his refusal had been a contempt of that law, Ruth must have plucked off his shoe, and spit in his face. Deut. 25: 9. But though his relation should in some measure oblige him to the duty, yet the distance of it might serve to excuse him from the penalty, or Ruth might very well dispense with it, since his refusal was all she desired from him. But Patrick, and the best interpreters, think this had no relation to that law, and that the drawing off of the shoe was not any disgrace, as there, but a confirmation of the surrender, and an evidence that it was not fraudulently or surreptitiously obtained. Note, Fair and open dealing in all matters of contract and commerce, all must make conscience of, that would approve themselves Israelites indeed, without guile. How much more honorably and honestly does Boaz come by this purchase, than if he had secretly undermined his kinsman, and privately struck a bargain with Naomi, unknown to him. Honesty will be found the best policy.

V. 9—12. Boaz now sees his way clear, therefore delays not to perform his promise, but, in the gate of his city, before the elders and people, publishes a marriage-contract between himself and Ruth the Moabitess, and therewith the purchase of all the estate of the family of Elimelech. If he had not been (ch. 2: 1.) a mighty man of wealth, he could not have compassed his redemption, nor done this service to his kinsman's family. What is a great estate good for, but that it enables a man to do so much the more good in his generation, and especially to those of his own household, if he have but a heart to use it so?

I. This marriage was solemnized, or at least published, before many witnesses, v. 9, 10. The value of the land was computed by the number of years to the year of jubilee, (Lev. 25: 15.) when it would have returned of course to Elimelech's family. The more public the sales of estates are, the better they are guarded against frauds. Ruth had no portion; what jointure she had, was incumbered, and he could not have it without giving its worth for it; therefore he might well say, he purchased her, and yet, being a virtuous woman, he reckoned he had a good bargain. House and riches are the inheritance of fathers, but a prudent wife is more valuable, is from the Lord, as a special gift. He designed, in marrying her, to preserve the memory of the dead, and this history being preserved for the sake of the marriage and the issue of it, it proved an effectual mean to perpetuate the name of Mahlon, even beyond the thought or intention of Boaz, to the world's end. God will be well pleased with, and will surely recompense, a tender and generous concern for the honor of the dead, and the comfort of poor widows and strangers, neither of which can return the kindness, Luke 14: 14. Our Lord Jesus is our Goel, our Redeemer; at a vast expense He redeemed the heavenly inheritance for us, which by sin was forfeited, and we could never have redeemed. He likewise purchased a peculiar people, whom He would espouse to Himself, though strangers and foreigners. He ventured to mar his own inheritance, to do this, for though rich, yet for our sakes He became poor; but He was abundantly recompensed for it by his Father, who hath highly exalted, and given Him a name above every name. Let us own our obligations, make sure our contract, and study all our days how to do Him honor.

Boaz, by a public declaration of this marriage and purchase, not only secured his title against all pretenders, but honored Ruth, showed that he was not ashamed of her, her parentage, and poverty, and left a testimony against clandestine marriages. Such regard was then had, even to the contemned crowd, that not only the elders, but all the people in the gate, passing and repassing, were appealed to, (v. 9.) and hearkened to, (v. 11.) when they said, We are witnesses.

II. It was attended with many prayers, (v. 11, 12.) Ruth, it should seem, was now sent for, for they speak of her (v. 12.) as present, this young woman. And very heartily they pray for the new-married couple. The senior elder, it is likely, made this prayer, and the rest of the elders, with the people, joined in it, therefore it is spoken of, as made by them all; for in public prayers, though but one speaks, we must all pray. Observe, Marriages ought to be blessed, and accompanied with prayer, because every creature and every condition are that to us, and no more, that God makes them to be. It is civil and friendly to wish all happiness to those who enter into that condition; and what good we desire, we should pray for from the Fountain of all good. The minister who gives himself to the word and prayer, as he is the fittest person to exhort, so he is the fittest to bless and pray for, those that enter into this relation. We ought to desire and pray for the prosperity one of another, so far from envying or grieving at it. Now here,

1. They pray for Ruth; that she might be like Rachel and Leah, rather than like Sarah and Rebekah; for Sarah had but one son, and Rebekah but one in covenant; Esau was rejected: but Rachel and Leah did build up the house of Israel; all their children were in the church, and their offspring numerous. quire many days' previous preparation of the attorney, and several hours' arguing between counsellors, till even an enlightened and conscientious judge would find it extremely difficult to decide whether Naomi might sell her own land: and whether Boaz or Peloni might buy it! Verses 9, 10.

As Orpah had preferred her connections in Moab to her prospects in Israel, she was not considered in this transaction; and Naomi transferred all her claim to Ruth. Consequently, when the nearest kinsman, before the elders of his city, by legal process, gave up his claim; Boaz, by marrying Ruth, possessed the whole right of Elimelech. Yet according to the law of God, and the custom in Israel, the eldest son of this marriage must be considered as the heir of Elimelech, and of Mahlon the former husband of Ruth: so that the land would be called by the name of one of them, and not by that of Boaz, that the family might not be considered as extinct. 3. They pray for the family; let thy house be like the house of Pharez; i. e. 'Let it be very numerous, let it greatly increase and multiply, as the house of Pharez did.' The Beth-lehemites were of the house of Pharez, and knew well how numerous it was; in the distribution of the tribes, that grandson of Jacob had the honor which none of the rest had but Manasseh and Ephraim, that his posterity was subdivided into two distinct families, Hezron and Hamul, Num. 26: 21.

V. 13—22. Here is, 1. Ruth a wife; Boaz took her, with the usual solemnities, to his house, and she became his wife, v. 13. All the city, no doubt, congratulated the preferment of a virtuous woman, purely for her virtues.

He that forsakes all for Christ, shall find more than all with Him; it shall be recompensed a hundred-fold in this present time. Boaz had prayed that this pious proselyte might receive a full reward of her courage and constancy from the God of Israel, under whose wings she was come to trust; and now he became an instrument of that kindness, which was an answer to his prayer, and helped to make his own words good. Now she had the command of those servants with whom she had associated, and of those fields in which she had gleaned. Thus God raiseth up the poor out of the dust to set them with princes.

2. Ruth a mother; the Lord gave her conception, for the fruit of the womb is his reward. He sometimes makes the woman that had been long barren, to be a joyful mother of children, Ps. 113: 9. Isa. 54: 1.

3. Ruth is still a daughter-in-law to Naomi, who, so far from being forgotten, was a principal sharer in these new joys. The good women present at this child's birth, congratulated Naomi upon it, more than either Boaz or Ruth, because she was the match-maker; and it was the family of her husband that was hereby built up. See here, as before, what an air of devotion then attended the common expressions of civility among the Israelites; prayer to God at the marriage, (v. 11.) and praise to Him at the birth of the child. What pity such pious language should either be disused among Christians, or degenerate into formality. 'Blessed be the Lord that has sent thee this grandson,' v. 14, 15. (1.) The preserver of the name of her family, and who, they hoped, would be famous, because his father was so. (2.) Who, they hoped, would be dutiful and kind to her; because his mother was so. If he but took after her, he would be a comfort to his aged grandmother, a restorer of her life, and, should there be occasion, would have wherewith to nourish her old age. Observe, They say of Ruth, that she loved Naomi, and therefore was better to her than seven sons. See how God in his providence sometimes makes up the want and loss of relations from whom we expected most comfort, in those from whom we expected least. The bonds of love prove stronger than those of nature, and there is a friend that sticks closer than a brother. See what wisdom and grace will do.

The good women would have the child called Obed, a servant, v. 17. either in remembrance of the poverty of the mother, or in prospect of his being hereafter serviceable to his grandmother. It is no dishonor to those that are ever so well born, to be servants to God, their friends, and their generation. The motto of the prince of Wales is, Ich dien—I serve.

4. Ruth has hereby that greatest honor, to be brought in among the ancestors of David and Christ.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Diligence in business, punctuality to engagements, integrity, and fair dealing in the affairs of common life, not only adorn a profession of godliness, but tend to prosperity in the ordinary course of Providence.—Men are generally ready to embrace opportunities of increasing their estates, but few know the value of godliness. Indeed, selfishness not only obliterates all charity and justice, but extinguishes natural affection; and causes men to treat with disdain their nearest relatives, however excellent, if poor and in need of their assistance. But the loss, in the final event of things, will be entirely their own; as the Lord will raise up other friends for such as love and trust in Him, and especially for those who have shown themselves willing to bear hardship for his sake. Nay, such persons, however poor, are a blessing to all connected with them. Especially they are to be valued in the marriage-relation. (Notes, Prov. 19: 14. 31: 10.)—As marriage is honorable in the sight of God, it ought to be publicly contracted and recognised, that it may be distinguished from those deeds of darkness which require concealment: and it is likely to be comfortable when the law of God is regarded, and his blessing supplicated. In this important concern, (as in all others,) pious people should pray for each other, that the parties may live together in peace, be good examples, do worthily in the church and in the world, and train up families for future usefulness.—The birth of children also calls for united prayers, that they may be indeed a comfort to their parents, blessings to society, and blessed themselves: for without the blessing of God, none of these things can be expected; and the general disuse of this pious language and behavior, by professing Christians, too plainly evinces that true religion is at a low ebb among us.—We should never promise ourselves much comfort from any earthly object; but if these streams are so refreshing, what may we not expect from the Fountain?

(13—15.) Naomi was congratulated more than Boaz or Ruth; as she had the ruins of her family thus providentially repaired, and her old age solaced after the death of her husband and sons. The piety of the language, and the conduct of all parties on this occasion, should not pass unnoticed.—The term kinsman, or redeemer, seems here applied to Naomi's grandson, as inheriting the rights of the whole family. (16.) Naomi took the child.] 'This might do for Naomi, but was bad for the child. The aged gain refreshment and energy by sleeping with the young, but it is at the expense of the young, and the hazard of premature decrepitude. Young children should never sleep habitually with the aged.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 18—22.

Pharez was born about 1714 B. C. and David about 680 years after, and ten generations seem too few for such a length of time. But the difficulty is very greatly increased, when it is recollected, that Salmon married Rachab, (doubtless the same as Rahab, Matt. 1: 5.) about 1450 B. C. leaving 365 years or more, to only 4 generations! Some learned men have attempted to show, that possibly Salmon, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse, were remarkably longlived; and that Boaz, Obed, Jesse, and David were born in the extreme old age of their respective fathers: but this at least is not probable, and it is certain that Jesse lived till David arrived at full manhood. (1 Sam. 17: 12, 13. 22: 3, 4.) It is therefore much more natural to suppose, that some names are omitted in the genealogy; as we know the case to have been in the genealogies given by the evangelists. (Matt. 1: 2—17.) AN EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES,

UPON THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL.

This book, and the following, bear the name of Samuel, not because he wrote them, (except to ch. 25 of the first, in which we have an account of his death,) but because the first begins with a large account of his birth, childhood, life and government; and the rest of the two contains the history of the reigns of Saul and David, both anointed by him. [He indeed figures as a principal person in this new epoch, formed by the change of government from judges to kings.] And because the history of these two kings takes up the greatest part of these books, the Vulgate Latin calls them the first and second Books of the Kings; and the two that follow, the third and fourth, which the titles of our English Bibles notice. The LXX call them the first and second Books of the Kingdoms: but there is no occasion to vary from the Hebrew verity. These two books contain the history of the last two judges, Eli and Samuel, who were not, as the rest men of war, but priests; and so much of them is an entrance on the history of the kings. They contain a considerable part of the sacred history, are sometimes referred to in the New Testament, and often in the title of David's Psalms, which, if placed in their order, would fall in, in these books. It is uncertain who was the penman of them; probably Samuel wrote the history of his own time, and, after him, some of the prophets that were with David, (Nathan, as likely as any,) continued it. [It is very reasonable to conclude [from 1 Chr. 29: 29.] that Samuel wrote the first acts of David; and after Samuel's death, Nathan and Gad, his last acts, and that the whole was formed into one book, which was ascribed to Samuel, as the more eminent person, and as the latter part formed a sort of appendix to the history he began.—Scott.] The first book gives us a full account of Eli's fall, and Samuel's rise and good government, ch. 1—8. Of Samuel's resignation of the government, and Saul's advancement and mal-administration, ch. 9—15. The choice of David, his struggles with Saul, Saul's ruin at last, and the opening of the way for David to the throne, ch. 16—31. And these things are written for our learning. Henry.

It is not agreed, how many years elapsed during the events [communicated in these books of Samuel]; some think 80, and others more, and some even 115 years. It is evident they were extant when 1 Kings was written, (Comp. 2: 35, 36. with 1 Kings 2: 27.) Almost every subsequent part of Scripture refers to the events recorded here as of undoubted certainty: especially very many of the Psalms are poems made on occasion of one or other of them.—Our Lord and his apostles quote them as a part of the Sacred Oracles. (Matt. 12: 3, 4. Acts 7: 45, 46. 13: 21, 22.)—[The sacred writer illustrates the characters, and describes the events of his history in the most engaging manner. The weak indulgence of Eli is well contrasted with the firm piety of Samuel. The rising virtues of David, and the sad depravity of Saul, are strikingly opposed. The sentiments and instructions scattered through the work are excellent.—Gray.] The history of David, the Son of Jesse, forms a sort of introduction to all the prophecies concerning his family; and especially concerning Christ, who sprang from the root of Jesse, was distinguished as the Son of David, and inherited the throne of David. (Ps. 2: 72. 89: 19—37. Is. 9: 6, 7. 11: 1—10. Acts 2: 25—31.) The narrative itself may in some sense be considered as prophetical, recording many typical events, which had their accomplishment in Christ. The books likewise contain several direct prophecies concerning the families of Eli and Saul, which were speedily fulfilled: and the song of Hannah concludes with a prophecy of our Lord, in which He is, for the first time, predicted expressly as the Messiah, the Anointed of God, (2: 10.) Scott.

'Mr. Reeves conjectures, that, as it appears from 1 Sam. 22: 5, that Gad was then with David in the secret hold; and since it is thought that Gad, being bred under Samuel, was privy to his having anointed David king, and had therefore resolved to accompany him in his troubles—the history of what happened to David, from the death of Samuel to his being made king at Hebron, (i. e. the last 7 chs. of 1 Sam. and first 4 of 2 Sam. with the first part of ch. 5.) were penned by Gad. He seems the most proper person, having been an eye-witness to most of the transactions.

'The prophet Nathan is first mentioned in 2 Sam. 7: 2. (a short time after David was settled at Jerusalem,) and frequently in the subsequent part of David's reign. He was one of those appointed by David to assist at the anointing of Solomon. (1 Kings 1: 32.) As this event took place not long before David's death, it is probable that Nathan might survive him: and, knowing all the transactions of his reign, from his settlement at Jerusalem to his death, it is most likely he wrote the history of the latter part of David's reign; especially as there is no mention of Gad, after the pestilence, for the numbering was about 2 years before the king's death, during which interval Gad might have died. Gad must have been advanced in years, and might leave the continuation of the national memoirs to Nathan. For these reasons it is thought that Nathan wrote all the chs. of 2 Sam. after the first five.

'Another opinion deserves consideration, viz. that these books are more recent than the persons already named, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad; but that they were composed out of their memoirs: some of the most learned Jews think by Jeremiah, and that the style nearly resembles his prophecies. That they were by an author more recent than Samuel, &c. Grotius thinks evident, because the names of the months are comparatively modern, and were not known among the ancient Jews. Others have attributed them to David, Hezekiah, or Ezra, on his return from Babylon.

'Calmet's opinion is, that they were written by the same hand, though composed out of memoirs left by persons contemporary with the transactions recorded; and that the compiler has generally used the terms he found in these memoirs; adding here and there something by way of illustration. The equality of the style, the frequent eulogiums on the character and conduct of Samuel, the connection of the materials, particular quotations and remarks on certain events, he thinks, prove this. It is clear that these books contain remarks and expressions which could proceed only from a contemporary author, and others which are evidences of a much later age. (1.) In 3: 1. we read, The word of the Lord was precious in those days; "there was no open vision," i. e. in the days of Eli; hence the author must have lived when prophecy was more common, which in fact it was after Samuel, under David and the succeeding kings of Judah and Israel. (2.) Bethel, in the author's time, was called Beth-aven, 13: 5. which name was given after Jeroboam placed the calves there. (3.) At 6: 18. it is said, the ark was set down in the field of Joshua, where it remained to the time of this author; yet in 7: 15. he speaks of Samuel, as already dead: and Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life. (4.) Samuel would not have spoken of himself as at 2: 26. but if he were dead, any author might have added this. (5.) In 17: 6. Achish gives Ziklag to David, "wherefore Ziklag pertaineth to the Kings of Judah unto this day." This proves, that when this book was written, the kingdoms of Judah and Israel were separated, &c. See Calmet. We may rest satisfied with three things. (1.) The books of Sam. were constructed out of original and authentic documents. (2.) That the compiler was not contemporary with the facts he narrates. (3.) Both the author, and the time in which he compiled his history, though comparatively more recent than the facts themselves, are nevertheless uncertain.'—See Dr. A. Clarke, and Crit. Biblica.

CHAP. I.

Elkanah, a Levite, has two wives, 1, 2. He goes yearly to worship at Shiloh, 3. He favors and comforts Hannah, when insulted by Peninnah on account of her barrenness, 4—8. Hannah in grief prays for a son, and vows to devote him to God as a perpetual Nazarite, 9—11. Eli through mistake at first rebukes, but afterwards blesses her, 12—18. She bears Samuel, stays till he is weaned, and then presents him to God, according to her vow, 19—28.

CHAP. I. V. 1—8. The history of Samuel, as that of Samson, and, afterwards, that of John the Baptist, and our blessed Savior, begins even before he was born. It is true of all, what God says of the prophet, Jer. 1: 5. But some great men, as Samue , were brought into the world with more observa on than others, and were more early disting shed from common persons. The story of Samson introduces him as a child of promise, Judg. 13. that of Samuel, as a child of prayer. Both together intimate what wonders are produced by the Word and prayer.

Samuel's father's name was Elkanah, a Levite of the family of the Kohathites, (the most honorable house of that tribe,) as appears, 1 Chron. 6: 33, 34. His ancestor Zuph was an Ephrathite, i. e. of Bethlehem-Judah, called Ephrathah. Ruth 1: 2. There this family was first seated, but one branch of it, in process of time, removed to mt. Ephraim, from which Elkanah descended: Perhaps their being originally Ephrathites is noticed, to show their alliance to David. This Elkanah lived at Ramah, or Ramathaim, double Ramah, the higher and lower, the same with Arimathea of which Joseph was, here called Ramathaim-zophim. Zophim signifies watchmen; probably, they had one of the schools of the prophets there, for prophets are called watchmen; the Chaldee paraphrase calls Elkanah a disciple of the prophets. But it seems to me prophecy was revived in Samuel; before his time there being, for a great while, no open vision, ch. 3: 1. Nor is there any mention of a prophet of the Lord from Moses to Samuel, except Judg. 6: 8. So that we have no reason to think there was any nursery or college of prophets here, till Samuel himself founded one, ch. 19: 19, 20.

I. Samuel's family was devout. Ministers should be patterns of family religion. I think this is the first time in Scripture, that God is called the Lord of hosts, (v. 3.) Jehovah Sabaoth, a name by which He was afterward very much called and known. Probably, Samuel first used this title, for the comfort of Israel, when in his time their hosts were few and feeble, and those of their enemies many and mighty. Elkanah was a country Levite, and, for aught that appears, had not any place or office which required his attendance at the tabernacle, but he went up as a common Israelite, with his own sacrifices, to encourage his neighbors, and set them a good example. When he sacrificed, he worshipped, joining prayers and thanksgivings with his sacrifices, and this constantly.

Elkanah kept his integrity, while others were remiss, and some worshipped idols. Hophni and Phinehas, Eli's sons, were the men now chiefly employed in the service of the house of God; and they conducted themselves very ill in their place; yet Elkanah went up to sacrifice. God had then tied his people to one place and one altar, therefore, in pure obedience, he attended at Shiloh; if the priests did not do their duty, he would do his: the validity and efficacy of the sacraments depend not on the purity of him that administers them.

II. Yet Samuel's was a divided family, and its divisions carried with them both guilt and grief. Where there is piety, it is pity but there should be unity. The joint devotions of a family should put an end to divisions in it.

The cause of this division, was Elkanah's marrying two wives, a transgression of the original institution of marriage; Matt. 19: 5, 8. It made mischief in Abraham's family, and Jacob's, and here in Elkanah's; how much better the law of God provides for our comfort and ease in this world, than we should, if left to ourselves! Probably Elkanah married Hannah first, and because he had no children by her so soon as he hoped, he married Peninnah, who bare him children, indeed, but was in other things a vexation to him. Thus are men often beaten with rods of their own making. The two wives could not agree. They had different blessings; Peninnah, like Leah, was fruitful, which should have made her easy and thankful, though but a second wife, and less beloved; Hannah, like Rachel, was childless indeed, but very dear to her husband, who took all occasions to let both her and others know it, (v. 5.) which should have made her easy and thankful. But they were of different tempers; Peninnah could not bear being fruitful, but grew haughty and insolent; Hannah could not bear being barren, but grew melancholy and discontented; and Elkanah had a difficult part to act between them, yet he kept up his attendance at God's altar, notwithstanding this unhappy difference, and took his wives and children, that if they could not agree in other things, they might agree to worship God together. If the devotions of a family prevail not to put an end to its divisions, yet let not the divisions put a stop to the devotions.

He did all he could, to encourage Hannah, and to keep up her spirits under her afflictions, v. 4, 5. Observe, 1. Elkanah loved his wife never the less for her being barren. Christ loves his church, notwithstanding her infirmities, her barrenness; and so ought men to love their wives. To abate our just love to any relation, for the sake of any infirmity which they cannot help, and which is not their sin, but their affliction, is to make God's providence quarrel with his precept, and very unkindly to add affliction to the afflicted. 2. He studied to show his love so much the more, because she was afflicted, insulted, and low-spirited. It is wisdom and duty to support the weakest, and to hold up those that are run down. 3. He showed his great love to her, by the share he gave her of his peace-offerings. Thus we should testify our affection to our friends and relations, by abounding in prayer for them. The better we love them, the more room let us give them in our prayers.

Peninnah was extremely peevish and provoking. 1. She upbraided Hannah with her affliction, despised her as barren, and taunted her as one whom Heaven did not favor. 2. She envied her interest in Elkanah's love, and the more kind he was to her, the more was she exasperated against her; which was all over base and barbarous. 3. She did this most when they went up to the house of the Lord, perhaps, because then they were more together than at other times, or because then Elkanah showed his affection most to Hannah. But it was very sinful at such a time, to show her malice, when pure hands were to be lifted up at God's altar, without wrath and quarrelling. It was, too, very unkind to vex Hannah then, not only because then they were in company, and others would notice it, but then Hannah was to mind her devotions, and desired to be most calm, composed, and free from disturbance. The great adversary to our purity and peace is then most industrious to ruffle us, when we should be most composed.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. 'Zophim' signifies watchmen, perhaps because some watch-towers and watchmen were stationed there; for 'Ramah' signifies exaltation: or it might be so called from Zuph, Elkanah's ancestor. SCOTT.—'No doubt two contiguous hills, on which watch-towers were built, and in which watchmen kept continual guard for the safety of the country; and which afterwards gave name to the place.' [See further, note, Josh. 19: 25.] DR. A. CLARKE.

Verse 3.

The stated worship at Shiloh was observed, but probably in an irregular manner; otherwise Elkanah, a Levite, would have had employment at the sanctuary. The Israelites were confined to one place, one altar, and one priesthood; and therefore Elkanah could not go elsewhere. But, though the wickedness of ministers does not deprive the pious Christian of the blessing, nor furnish a sufficient excuse for neglecting the ordinances of God; yet we, not being under a similar limitation, should certainly prefer attending on the ministry of those, who appear at least to be walking heaven-ward themselves, as well as teaching others the true way thither; and not countenance either heretical teachers, or ungodly men. (Prov. 19: 27. 1 John 4: 1—3. 2 John 7—11.) SCOTT.

In Shiloh.] 'That town or place was considered peculiarly holy, in which the tabernacle was fixed.—Shiloh was situated on a pleasant mountain, 23 miles [others say 15,] north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Ephraim.' JAHN.

Verses 4—7.

After the other appointed sacrifices had been brought, the peace-offerings were presented, on part of which the offerer feasted with his family, having given to each a portion. On these occasions, Elkanah showed his peculiar attention to Hannah by the customary indications; which probably excited the envy and jealousy of Peninnah, as well as her proud contempt of Hannah's barrenness; and thus great uneasiness was occasioned. (Gen. 16: 4—6. 37: 3.) SCOTT.

Or, because she took a pleasure in her uneasiness: nor could Hannah gratify her more than by fretting. Note, It is an evidence of a bad disposition, to delight in grieving those that are melancholy and of a sorrowful spirit, and in putting those out of humor, that are apt to fret and be uneasy. We ought to bear one another's burdens, not add to them.

Hannah (poor woman) could not bear the provocation, v. 7. It made her uneasy to herself and to all her relations. Her trouble took away her appetite, made her unfit for any company, and a jar in the harmony of family-joy. It was of the feast upon the sacrifice that she did not eat, for they were not to eat of the holy things in their mourning, Deut. 26: 14. Lev. 10: 19. Yet it was her infirmity, so far to give way to the sorrow of the world, as to unfit herself for holy joy in God. Those that are of a fretful spirit, and are apt to lay provocations too much to heart, are enemies to themselves, and strip themselves very much of the comforts both of life and godliness. We find God noticed this ill effect of discontents and disagreements in the conjugal relation; the parties aggrieved covered the altar of the Lord with tears, insomuch that He regarded not the offering, Mal. 2: 13.

Elkanah said what he could to comfort her. She did not upbraid him as Sarah did Abraham, nor did she render to Peninnah railing for railing, but took the trouble wholly to herself, which made her an object of much compassion. Elkanah showed himself extremely grieved at her grief, v. 8. They that by marriage are made one flesh, ought thus far to be of one spirit too, to share in each other's troubles, so that one cannot be easy while the other is uneasy. He gives her a loving reproof for it. Why weepest thou? And why is thy heart grieved? As many as God loves He rebukes, and so should we. He puts her on inquiring into the cause of her grief; let her consider whether she had reason to be troubled to such a degree; especially so much as to be taken off by it from eating of the holy things. Note, Our sorrow on any account is then sinful and inordinate, when it diverts us from our duty to God, and imbitters our comfort in Him; when it makes us unthankful for the mercies we enjoy, and distrustful of the goodness of God to us in further mercies; when it casts a damp on our joy in Christ, and hinders us from doing the duty, and taking the comfort, of our particular relations. He intimates that nothing should be wanting on his part to balance her grief. 'Am not I better to thee than ten sons? Thou knowest thou hast my affection entire, and let that comfort thee.' Note, We ought to notice our comforts, to keep us from grieving excessively for our crosses; for, our crosses we deserve, but our comforts we have forfeited. If we would keep the balance even, we must look at that which is for us, as well as that which is against us, else we are unjust to Providence, and unkind to ourselves. God hath set the one over-against the other, and so should we.

V. 9—18. Here we find the good effect of Elkanah's gentle reproof.

Hannah did not harden herself in sorrow, nor grow sullen when reproved for it; but perceiving her husband uneasy, cheered up as well as she could, and came to table. It is as great a piece of self-denial to control our passions, as our appetites

Elkanah's saying, Am not I better to thee than ten sons? perhaps occasioned her to think, 'Whether he be so or no, God is, and therefore to Him will I apply myself.' If ever she will make a more solemn address than ordinary to the throne of grace on this errand, now is the time. They are at Shiloh, at the door of the tabernacle, where God had promised to meet his people, and which was the house of prayer. They had lately offered their peace-offerings, to obtain the favor of God and all good, and in token of communion with Him; and, taking the comfort of being accepted, they had feasted on the sacrifice, and now it was proper to put up her prayer in virtue of that sacrifice; for the peace-offerings typified Christ's mediation, as well as the sin-offerings; for by it not only atonement is made for sin, but the audience and acceptance of our prayers, and an answer of peace to them, are obtained for us: to that Sacrifice, in all our supplications, we must have an eye.

This good use we should make of our afflictions, they should make us the more lively in our addresses to God, v. 10. Our blessed Savior Himself, being in an agony, prayed more earnestly.

She was very particular, and yet very modest, in her petition, v. 11. God gives us leave, not only to ask good things in general, but to mention that special good we most need and desire. Yet she says not, as Rachel, Give me children. She will be very thankful for one.

Her son would be, by birth, a Levite, and so devoted to the service of God; but he should be, by her vow, a Nazarite, and his very childhood sacred. Probably she had acquainted Elkanah with her purpose before, and had his consent and approbation. Note, (1.) Parents have a right to dedicate their children to God, as living sacrifices and spiritual priests; and an obligation is thereby laid on them to serve God faithfully all the days of their life. (2.) It is very proper, when in pursuit of any mercy, to bind our souls with a

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8 Experience universally evinces the kindness, as well as equity, of the original institution of marriage, and the divine law concerning it: for every deviation makes way for domestic contention, envy, malice, impatience, and every evil work, to the interruption of the worship of God, and the ruin of family religion.—If Satan can induce us to yield to discouragement in one respect, he will attempt it in another, and never cease to harass us, when engaged in the duties of religion, till he has driven us from every mean of grace, and solemn act of holy worship: so that resolute resistance and perseverance, with earnest cries to the Lord for his assistance, are our only successful weapons: and we should not in the least degree 'give place to the devil.'—The human heart can neither bear prosperity without insolence, nor adversity without impatience: could we change conditions in every respect with others, we should generally increase our uneasiness; whereas impartial reflection on our own situation in life, compared with our unworthiness, and with the condition of others, would silence our complaints, or convert them into thankful praises.—All inordinate passions are irrational, as well as inimical to our comfort; yet even pious Christians, who are shocked at the thought of yielding to other temptations, often rebelliously and ungratefully indulge excessive grief, against which they ought especially to watch and pray. But if our earthly comforts, when duly estimated, being greater than our sorrows, should console us under our trials; surely the favor of God is better to his people, than all beloved relations or outward satisfactions, and sufficient to compensate for the loss or the want of them all.—Every one should comfort those who are in bitterness of soul: yet a mild and tender rebuke is frequently the greatest kindness, when we see our friends forgetting their mercies, or their duty. SCOTT.

Verses 9—11.

The tabernacle, now become stationary, was sometimes called 'the temple.' (3: 3. Ps. 27: 4. 29: 9.)—[Some, as Calmet, Dr. A. Clarke, (see next note,) &c. suspect from the use of the word 'temple' that the books of Samuel were not compiled till the first temple was built. Patrick remarks, 'It is not unusual to call the tabernacle by the name of a temple: as the temple is called a tabernacle, Jer. 10: 20. Lam. 2: 6.' ED.]—Some learned men compute that Samuel was born before Samson, whom God thus separated to Himself, and for a special purpose, before his birth; but others think he was born about the same time, or a few years after him. The chronology of this part of the history, however, is extremely obscure, and the attempts of learned men to elucidate it are peculiarly unsatisfactory, and often widely discordant from each other. SCOTT.

(9.) Temple.] 'I think this is the first place where this is mentioned, which gives room for a strong suspicion, that the books of Samuel were not compiled till the first temple was built, or after the days of Solomon.' [See the Pref. &c.] Dr. A. CLARKE.

13 Now Hannah, she [a] spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard: therefore Eli thought [b] she had been drunken.

14 And Eli said unto her, [c] How long wilt thou be drunken? [d] put away thy wine from thee.

15 And Hannah answered and said, [e] No, my lord; I am a woman ‡ of a sorrowful spirit: I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, but have [f] poured out my soul before the LORD.

17 Then Eli answered and said, [i] Go in peace: and [k] the God of Israel grant thee thy petition that thou hast asked of him.

18 And she said, Let thine handmaid find grace in thy sight. So the woman [m] went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad.

[Practical Observations.]

19 ¶ And [n] they rose up in the morning early, and worshipped before the LORD, that if God give it us, we will devote it to his honor, and cheerfully use it in his service. Not that hereby we can pretend to merit the gift, but thus we are qualified for it, and the comfort of it. In hope of mercy, let us promise duty.

She spoke all this so softly, that none could hear her, v. 13. Hereby she testified her belief of God's knowledge of the heart and its desires. Thoughts are words with Him, nor is He one of those gods that must be cried aloud to. It was likewise an instance of her humility and holy shame-facedness in her approach to God; she was none of those that made her voice to be heard on high, Isa. 58: 4. It was a secret prayer, though made in a public place, not as the Pharisees' to be seen of men. True, we have no reason to be ashamed of prayer, but we must avoid all appearances of ostentation. Let what passes between God and our souls, be kept to ourselves.

Eli was now high priest, and judge of Israel: he sat upon a seat in the temple, to receive addresses, and oversee and direct what was done there, v. 9. The tabernacle is here called the temple, because it was now fixed, and served all the purposes of a temple. Somewhere, probably in a private corner, he espied Hannah at her prayers, and, by her unusual manner, fancied she was drunken, v. 14.—the very imputation Peter and the apostles fell under, when the Holy Ghost gave them utterance. Perhaps, in this degenerate age, it was no strange thing to see drunken women at the door of the tabernacle; for, otherwise, one would think the vile lust of Hophni and Phinehas could not have found so easy a prey there, ch. 2: 22. Eli took Hannah for one of these. It is one bad effect of the abounding of iniquity, and its becoming fashionable, that it often gives occasion to suspect the innocent. When a disease is epidemical, every one is suspected to be tainted with it.

Now, (1.) this was Eli's fault, and a great fault, to pass so severe a censure without better observation or information. His fault was the worse, that he was the priest of the Lord, who should have had compassion on the ignorant, Heb. 5: 2. Note, It ill becomes us to be rash and hasty in our censures of others, and forward to believe people guilty, while either the matter of fact, on which the censure is grounded, is doubtful and unproved, or is capable of a good construction. Charity commands us to hope the best concerning all, and forbids censoriousness. Paul had very good information, when he did but partly believe, (1 Cor. 11: 18.) hoping it was not so. Especially we ought to be cautious how we censure the devotion of others, lest we call that hypocrisy, enthusiasm, or superstition, which is really the fruit of honest zeal, and accepted of God.

(2.) Hannah had been reproved by Elkanah, because she would not eat and drink; and now to be reproached by Eli, as if she had eaten and drunk too much, was very hard. It is no new thing for those that do well, to be ill thought of Hannah bore it admirably well; she did not retort the charge, and upbraid him with the debauchery of his own sons; did not tell him how ill it became one in his place, thus to abuse a poor sorrowful worshipper at the throne of grace. When at any time unjustly censured, we need set a double watch before the door of our lips, that we do not recriminate, and return censure for censure. Hannah thought it enough to vindicate herself, and so must we, v. 15, 16. In justice to herself, she expressly denies the charge; but in justice to him, she accounts for the manner which had given occasion to his suspicion. Note, When unjustly censured, we should endeavor, not only to clear ourselves, but to satisfy our brethren, by giving them a just and true account of that which they misapprehended.

Eli did not (as many are apt to in such a case) take it for an affront to have his mistake rectified, nor did it put him out of humor. But, on the contrary, he now encouraged Hannah's devotions, as much as before he had discountenanced them; not only intimated he was satisfied of her innocency, by those words, Go in peace, but being high-priest, as one having authority, he blessed her in the name of the Lord, and though he knew not what the particular blessing was, she had been praying for, yet he puts his Amen to it, so good an opinion had he now conceived of her prudence and piety. The God of Israel grant thee thy petition, whatever it is, that thou hast asked of Him. Note, By our meek and humble carriage toward those that reproach us, because they did not know us, we may perhaps make them our friends, and turn their censures into prayers.

Hannah now went away, with great satisfaction of mind, v. 18. Whence came this sudden, happy change? She had by prayer committed her case to God, and left it with Him, and now was no more perplexed about it. She had prayed for herself, and Eli had prayed for her; and she believed God would either give her the mercy she had prayed for, or make up the want of it to her some other way. Note, Prayer is heart's ease to a gracious soul; the seed of Jacob have often found it so, being confident that God will never say to them, Seek ye Me in vain. See Phil. 4: 6, 7.

V. 19—28. Elkanah and his family had a journey before them, and a family of children with them, yet they would not stir till they had worship-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9—18. Nothing can give solid comfort to those who are in anguish of spirit, but the assurance and experience of the love of God in their hearts; nor will that cordial in general be communicated, till they have 'poured out their souls' repeatedly in earnest secret prayer. Yet, through Satan's temptations, and the evil of our hearts, we are often reluctant to begin, slight in presenting, and hasty in concluding our petitions! Hence it is that we go mourning all the day long, instead of 'casting our burden on the LORD:' and our miseries will increase upon us, till we take this course. (Phil. 4.5—7. 1 Pet. 5:5—7.)—The more we experience the sweet consolations which are communicated while the soul is poured out before the Lord, the more we shall determine 'to call upon Him as long as we live.' (Ps. 116: 2.)—Among the various trials, to which we are exposed, none is in general more bitter, than the suspicions and censures of those whom we love and esteem. But while God hears our prayers, we may bear even this with patience, and answer it with meekness: for if our loving Father sees that correction needful, and favors us with the assurance of his acceptance, and the light of his countenance, we may thankfully submit to his will.—Even before those blessings which we have asked in prayer are vouchsafed, or expected with certainty, He sometimes communicates such supports to the soul, as exceed every temporal advantage, can be destroyed by no outward trouble, and give a relish for those mercies which before we undervalued or overlooked.—We are also most likely to obtain all our warranted desires, when we are rendered most willing to submit them to the will of God.

Verse 15.

Hannah emphatically described the nature of fervent prayer: 'I have poured out my soul before the LORD.' (M. R. f.) Prayer does not consist merely in using good words, but in opening before the Lord the inmost soul, and, in unreserved confidence, pouring out before Him all our fears, sorrows, desires, and purposes; as a child would before a loving father, from whom alone he had expectations of relief, and who, he was satisfied, was able and disposed to help him. ped God together. Prayer and provender hinder no journey. They had now spent several days in religious worship, yet attended once more. We should not be weary of well-doing.

At length the Lord remembered Hannah. Though God seems long to forget his people's burdens, troubles, cares, and prayers, yet He will at length make it to appear they are not out of his mind. Some make Samuel to be much the same with Ishmael, heard of God, because the mother's prayers were remarkably heard, and he was an answer to them. Others, because of the reason she gives for the name, make it to signify asked of God; it comes nearly to the same; she designed by it to perpetuate the remembrance of God's favor in answering her prayers. Note, Mercies in answer to prayer, are to be remembered with peculiar expressions of thankfulness, as Ps. 116: 1, 2. Hannah intended by this name to put her son in mind of his obligation to be the Lord's, in consideration that he was asked of God, and at the same time dedicated to Him. A child of prayer is, in a special manner, bound to be a good child. Lemuel's mother reminds him, that he was the son of her vows.

Hannah closely attended to nursing him, not only because he was dear to her, but because he was devoted to God. We ought to take care of our children, not only with an eye to the law of nature, as they are ours, but with an eye to the covenant of grace, as they are given up to God. See Ezek. 16: 20, 21. This sanctifies the nursing of them, when it is done as unto the Lord.

Elkanah went up every year to worship at the tabernacle, and particularly to perform his vow; perhaps one distinct from Hannah's, if God would give him a son by her, v. 21. But Hannah, though she had been accustomed to go, now excused herself. 1. Because she would not be so long absent from her nursery: if she had gone any whither, she would have gone to Shiloh. Note, God will have mercy, and not sacrifice. Persons detained from public ordinances, by the nursing and tending of little children, may believe, that if they do that with an eye to God, He will graciously accept them therein. 2. Because she would not go up to Shiloh till her son was big enough, not only to be taken thither, but to be left there; for if once she took him thither, she thought she could never find it in her heart to bring him back again. Note, Those who are steadfastly resolved to pay their vows, may yet see good cause to defer the payment of them. Every thing is beautiful in its season. Lev. 22: 27. Elkanah agrees to what she proposes, v. 23. How good and pleasant it is, when yoke-fellows thus draw even in the yoke, each thinking well of what the other does, especially in works of piety and charity. He adds a prayer, Only the Lord establish his word; i. e. 'God preserve the child through the perils of his infancy, that the solemn vow which God signified his acceptance of, by giving us the child, may be performed in its season, and so the whole matter be accomplished.' Note, Those that have in sincerity devoted their children to God, may with comfort pray for them, that God will establish the word sealed to them, at the same time they were sealed for Him.

Here is the solemn entering of this child into the service of the sanctuary. We may take it for granted he was presented to the Lord at 40 days old, as all the first-born were; (Luke 2: 22, 23.) but that is not mentioned, because in nothing singular; but now that he was weaned, he was presented, not to be redeemed. Some think it was as soon as he was weaned from the breast, which, the Jews say, was not till he was three years old, v. 23. Others think it was not till he was weaned from childish things, at eight or ten years old. But I see no inconvenience in admitting such an extraordinary child as this, into the tabernacle, at three years old, to be educated among the children of the priests. It is said, v. 24. The child was young; but, being intelligent above his years, he was no trouble. None can begin too soon to be religious. The child was a child, so the Hebrew reads it, in his learning-age. Isa. 28: 9.

Observe how she presented her child.

1. With a sacrifice; no less than three bullocks, with a meat-offering for each, v. 24. A bullock, perhaps, for each year of the child's life. Or, one for a burnt-offering, another for a sin-offering, and the third for a peace-offering: So far was she from thinking that, by presenting her son to God, she made God her debtor. All our covenants with God for ourselves, and ours, must be made by sacrifice, the great Sacrifice.

2. With a grateful acknowledgment of God's goodness in answer to prayer. This she makes to Eli, because he had encouraged her to hope for an answer of peace; v. 26, 27. 'You have forgotten me, my lord; but I, who now appear so cheerful, am the woman, that, three years ago, stood here, weeping and praying, and this was the child I prayed for.' Answers of prayer may thus be humbly triumphed in, to the glory of God. Here is a living testimony for God, 'I am his witness that He is gracious.' See Ps. 66: 16—19. 34: 2, 4, 6. Hannah does not remind Eli of it by adverting to the suspicion he had formerly expressed. Good men ought not to be upbraided with their infirmities and oversights; they have themselves repented of them, let them hear no more of them.

3. With a full surrender of all her interest in this child unto the Lord, v. 28. And she repeats it, because she will never revoke it, he shall be (a deodand) lent or given to the Lord. Not that she designed to call him back, as we do what we lend, but she uses this word, Shaol, he lent, because it is the same word she had used before, v. 20. I asked, only in another conjugation. And, v. 27. the Lord gave me the petition I asked, (Shaalti, in Kal, therefore I have lent him; Hishilti, the same word in Hiphil:) and so it gives another etymology of his name, Samuel, not only asked of God, but lent to God. And observe, (1.) Whatever we give to God, may, on this account, be said to be lent from Him. All our gifts to Him were first gifts to us. Of thine own, Lord, have we given Thee, 1 Chron. 29: 14, 16. (2.) Whatever we give to God, may, on this account, be said to be lent to Him; that though we may not recall it as a thing lent, yet He will certainly repay it with interest, to our unspeakable advantage, particularly what is given to his poor, Prov. 19: 17. When by baptism we dedicate our children to God, let us remember that they were his before by a sovereign right, and that they are ours still so much the more to our comfort. Hannah resigns him to the Lord, not for a certain term of years, as children are sent apprentices, but as long as he liveth; a Nazarite for life. Such must our covenant with God be, a marriage-covenant; as long as we live, we must be his and never forsake Him.

Lastly, The child Samuel did his part beyond what could have been expected from his years;

V. 19. Returned.] To reconcile this with the expression, 'went her way,' v. 18. Boothr. following the Sept. reads that v. thus, 'So the woman went her way to her own lodgings,' &c. 'For Hannah did not now [v. 18.] go on her way home, but abode all night at Shiloh; and on the following day, after having performed their devotions, they all returned together.' ED.

for of him that seems to be spoken, He worshipped the Lord there; i. e. he said his prayers. He was, no doubt, extraordinarily forward, (we have known children that have discovered some sense of religion very young,) and his mother, designing him for the sanctuary, took particular care to train him up to that which was to be his work in the sanctuary. Note, Little children should learn betimes to worship God. Their parents should instruct them in it, and bring them to it; put them upon doing it as well as they can, and God will graciously accept them, and teach them to do better.

CHAP. II. V. 1—10. We have here Hannah's thanksgiving, dictated, not only by the spirit of prayer, but by the spirit of prophecy. Observe in general, 1. When she had received mercy from God, she owned it, with thankfulness. Not like the nine lepers, Luke 17: 17. 2. The mercy was an answer to prayer, therefore she thought herself especially obliged to give thanks for it. What we win by prayer, we may wear with comfort, and must wear with praise. 3. Her thanksgiving is here called a prayer; for thanksgiving is an essential part of prayer. In every address to God, we must express a grateful regard to Him as our Benefactor. Nay, and thanksgiving for mercies received, shall be accepted as a petition for further mercy. 4. From this particular mercy which she had received, she takes occasion, with an elevated and enlarged heart, to speak glorious things of God, and of his government of the world, for the good of his church. 5. Her prayer was mental, but her thanksgiving vocal. She spake, that all might hear. She made her supplication with groanings that could not be uttered, but now her lips were opened, to show forth God's praise. 6. This thanksgiving is here left on record for the encouragement of those of the weaker sex to attend the throne of grace; God will regard their prayers and praises. Mary's song has great affinity with this of Hannah, Luke 1: 46.

Three things we have in this thanksgiving.

I. Hannah's triumph in God, in his glorious perfections, and the great things He had done for her, v. 1—3. Every stream should lead us to the Fountain. There is none beside Thee. Note, God is to be praised as a peerless Being, and of unparalleled perfection; this glory is due unto his name. Ps. 18: 31. 1. Hannah here celebrates four of God's glorious attributes. (1.) His unspotted purity. When Israel triumphed over the Egyptians, God was praised, as glorious in holiness. So here, There is none holy as the Lord. It is the rectitude of his nature, his infinite agreement with Himself, and the equity of his government and judgment, in all the administrations of both. At the remembrance of this, we ought to give thanks. (2.) His almighty power. Hannah had experienced a mighty support by staying herself on Him, and therefore speaks as she had found, and seems to refer to that of Moses, Deut. 32: 31. (3.) His unsearchable wisdom. He clearly and perfectly sees into the character of every person, and the merits of every cause, and He gives knowledge and understanding to those that seek it of Him. (4.) His unerring justice. By Him actions are weighed. His own, in his eternal counsels; the actions of the children of men, in the balance of his judgments; so He will render to every man according to his work, and is not mistaken in what any man is, or does.

2. How she solaces herself in these things. We may take the comfort of that, of which we give God the glory. She rejoiceth in the Lord; not so much in her son, as in her God; in his salvation, the salvation of Israel. 'My horn is exalted; not only my reputation saved by my having a son, but greatly raised by having such a son.' The horn was an instrument of music, in praising God; (1 Chron. 25: 5.) so, My horn is exalted, means, 'My praises are very much elevated to an unusual strain.' [But see notes.] My mouth is enlarged; this is, 'Now I have wherewith to answer them that reproached me;' he that has his house full of children, shall not be ashamed to speak with the enemy in the gate, Ps. 127: 5.

3. How she herewith silences those that set up themselves as rivals with God, and rebels against Him, v. 3. Let not Peninnah and her children upbraid her any more. See Mic. 7: 10. Then she that is mine enemy shall see it, and shame shall cover her that said, Where is thy God? Or, perhaps, it was below her to take so much notice of Peninnah, but she intended to check the insolence of the Philistines, and other enemies of God and Israel, Ps. 73: 9.

II. The notice she takes of the wisdom and sovereignty of the divine providence, in its disposal of the affairs of the children of men; such are the vicissitudes of them, and such the strange and sudden turns and revolutions of them, that it is often found a very short step between the height of prosperity and the depth of adversity; Eccl 7: 14. that we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

1. The strong are soon weakened, and the weak soon strengthened, when God pleases, v. 4. On the one hand, if He speak, the bows of the mighty men are broken. Or, on the other hand, if He speak, they who stumble through weakness, who were so feeble they could not go straight or steady, are girded with strength, in body and mind, and are able to bring great things to pass.

2. The rich are soon impoverished, and the poor strangely enriched of a sudden, v. 5. This is not to be ascribed to fortune, nor merely to men's wisdom or folly, Eccl. 9: 11. nor is it always men's own fault that they become poor. Are

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19—28. No temporal satisfaction can be durably comfortable, which we cannot name, 'Asked of the LORD;' and which we do not receive from Him with gratitude as an answer to our prayers, and uprightly desire to use to his glory and in his service. If He give us children, we shall have the most comfort in them, when they are most entirely his: and therefore we should devote them to Him from the first; bring them up for Him; and pray continually that we may see early proofs of his having received them into his family, and made them his to serve Him all their days.—There are times, when domestic employments may render it a duty to be occasionally absent from public ordinances: but those seasons should abound the more in the exercises of secret devotion; and when special blessings have been conferred, and restraints are removed, the true believer will go with more longing desires to the courts of the Lord, to pay his vows, and render his grateful praises. With what transport then will he at last leave this distant land below, to ascend to the courts above, to receive the full answer of all his prayers, and to offer everlasting praises, with an uninterrupted flow of holy affections and ineffable delight! NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. The word prayer is sometimes used for any act of devotion. (M. R. a.) (Notes, Hab. 3: 17—19. Luke 1: 46—55. Phil. 4: 4.) SCOTT.

Mine horn is exalted.] 'There may be an allusion in these passages [where "the horn" is spoken of as in this ch.] to a very common part of female dress in some parts of the east. Buckingham, describing a female's ornaments at Tyre, says, "She wore also on her head a hollow silver horn, rearing itself upwards obliquely from her forehead, being 4 or 5 inches in diameter at the root, and pointed at its extreme." ' ROBINSON. The same accomplished traveller and distinguished philanthropist, quoted by Robinson above, remarked in conversation, that the Druses of Mt. Libanus have "horns" of gold, silver, &c. according to the rank of the wearer, and mentioned a ceremony in which these were "exalted." The cut is from Bruce, who noticed them, ('denoting strength and power, as the chief defence and strength of many beasts is in their horns,') bound on the foreheads of Abyssinian chiefs. The Sipahis (Sepoys) of India retain a similar ornament upon their military caps. Comp. too the cut, Ex 17: 10. ED.

there is [f] none beside thee; neither is there any [h] rock like our God.

3 Talk no more so exceeding proudly; [i] let not [k] arrogancy come out of your mouth: for the LORD is [l] a God of knowledge, and [l] by him actions are weighed.

4 The [m] bows of the mighty men are broken, and they that [n] stumbled are girded with strength.

5 They that were [o] full, have hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased: so that [p] the barren hath born seven; and she that hath many children is [q] waxed feeble.

6 The LORD [r] killeth, and maketh alive: [s] he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up.

7 The LORD [t] maketh poor, and maketh rich: he [u] bringeth low, and lifteth up.

8 He raiseth up [x] the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to [y] set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory: for [z] the pillars of the earth are the LORD's, and he hath set the world upon them.

9 He [a] will keep the feet of [b] his saints, and the wicked shall [c] be silent in darkness; for [d] by strength shall no man prevail.

10 The [e] adversaries of the LORD shall be broken to pieces; out we poor? God made us poor, which is a good reason why we should be content, and reconcile ourselves to our condition. Are we rich? God made us rich, which is a good reason why we should be thankful, and serve Him cheerfully in the abundance of good things He gives us. It may be understood of the same person; those that were rich God makes poor, and after a while makes rich again, as Job. Let not the rich be proud and secure, for God can soon make them poor; let not the poor despond and despair, for God can in due time enrich them again.

3. Empty families are replenished, and numerous families made few. Job. 12: 23. Ps. 107: 38, &c. This instance comes close to the occasion of the thanksgiving. The barren hath borne seven, meaning herself, for though at present she had but one son, yet that one being a Nazarite, devoted to God, and employed in his immediate service, he was to her as good as seven. Or, it is the language of her faith; and she was not disappointed, she had five more; (v. 21.) so that if we reckon Samuel but for two, as we may well, she has the number she promised herself.

4. God is the sovereign Lord of life and death; v. 6. Understand it, (1.) Of God's sovereign dominion and universal agency, in lives and deaths. He presides in births and burials, for in his hand are the keys of death and the grave, and to Him belong the issues from death. (2.) Of the distinction He makes between some and others; He killeth some, and maketh, i. e. keepeth others alive that were in the same danger, in war, suppose, or pestilence. Two in a bed together, it may be; one taken by death, and the other yet alive; even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. Living and dying do not go by likelihoods. (3.) Of the changes He makes with one and the same person. He killeth and bringeth down to the grave; i. e. He brings even to death's doors, and then revives and raises up, when even life was despaired of, and a sentence of death received, 2 Cor. 1: 8, 9. He turns to destruction, and then says, Return, Ps. 90: 3.

5. Advancement and abasement are both from Him. He brings some low, and lifts up others; (v. 7.) Or, it may be understood of the same persons; those whom He had brought low, when they are sufficiently humbled, He lifteth up. This is enlarged upon, v. 8. See Ps. 113: 7, 8. Promotion comes not by chance, but from the counsel of God, which often prefers those that were very unlikely, and that men thought very unworthy. Joseph and Daniel, Moses and David, were thus strangely advanced, from a prison to a palace, from a sheep-hook to a sceptre. Let not those whom Providence has thus preferred, be upbraided with the meanness they are raised out of, for the meaner their beginnings were, the more are they favored, and God glorified, in their advancement, if it be by lawful and honorable means.

Lastly, A reason is given for all these dispensations, which obliges us to acquiesce in them, how surprising soever they are, for the pillars of the earth are the Lord's. If we understand it literally, it bespeaks God's almighty power, which cannot be controlled: if figuratively, it bespeaks his incontestable sovereignty, which cannot be disputed. The princes and great ones of the earth, the directors of states and governments, are the pillars of the earth, Ps. 75: 3. On these hinges the affairs of the world seem to turn, but they are the Lord's, Ps. 47: 9. From Him they have their power, therefore He may advance whom He pleases; and who may say, What dost Thou?

III. A prediction of the preservation and advancement of all God's faithful friends, and the destruction of all his and their enemies. Having testified her joyful triumph in what God had done, and is doing, she concludes with joyful hopes of what He would do, v. 9, 10. Pious affections (says Patrick) in those days rose up many times to the height of prophecy, whereby God continued in that nation his true religion, in the midst of their idolatrous inclinations. This prophecy may refer, 1. More immediately to the government of Israel by Samuel, and David whom he was employed to anoint. The birth of Samuel was introductory to an extraordinary change. But, 2. We have reason to think the prophecy looks further, to the kingdom of Christ, and the administration of that kingdom of grace. Here we first meet with the name Messiah, or his Anointed. The ancient expositors, both Jewish and Christian, make it look beyond David, to the Son of David; glorious things are here spoken of the kingdom of the Mediator, both before and since his incarnation; for the method of the administration of it, both by the eternal Word, and by that Word made flesh, is much the same.

Concerning that kingdom we are here assured, (1.) That all the loyal subjects of it shall be carefully and powerfully protected, v. 9. There are a people in the world that are God's saints, his select and sanctified ones; and He will keep their feet, i. e. all that belongs to them shall be under his protection. If He will keep their feet, much more their head and hearts; or, He will keep their feet, i. e. secure the ground they stand on, and establish their goings, guard their affections and actions, that their feet may neither wander out of the way, nor stumble in the way. When their feet are ready to slip his mercy holdeth them up, and keepeth them from falling, Jude 24. While we keep God's ways, He will keep our feet. See Ps. 37: 23, 24.

(2.) That all the powers engaged against it shall not be able to effect its ruin.

(3.) That all its enemies will certainly be broken and brought down, v. 9. they shall be struck both blind and dumb. Damned sinners are sentenced to utter darkness, and in it they will be for ever speechless, Matt. 22: 12, 13. The wicked are called, The adversaries of the Lord, and it is foretold, v. 10. that they shall be broken to pieces.

Verse 3.

Hannah seems here to address the enemies of true religion; who, confiding in numbers, courage, or ability, glory in themselves and insultingly despise believers.—The last clause may be rendered, 'By Him works are regulated:' He orders every thing in perfect wisdom and power, and none can defeat his purposes. Or, still more exactly according to the text, Are not works by Him regulated? (M. R.) SCOTT.

Verses 4—8.

The events which these verses speak of, are often called the caprices of blind fortune: but they in fact are the settled purposes of God, thus manifesting his own perfections by saving those who trust in Him; and pouring contempt on all the distinctions, in which ungodly men confide and glory.—These things are equally applicable to the dispensations of his kingdom of grace; in which He respects, not men's wisdom, learning, greatness, or imagined excellency, but selects the base, the poor, the foolish of the world, having taught them to feel their guilt and misery, and to value his free and precious salvation: and all this 'according to the eternal purpose, which He hath purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.' (Matt. 19: 29, 30. 1 Cor. 1: 26—31. Eph. 1: 3—12.) SCOTT.

Verse 10.

When Hannah spake this song, there was no king over Israel, so that her words here must be prophetical, both of David the type, and Christ the Anti-type.—'Who doth not see that the spirit of this woman (whose name was Anna, which signifies grace,) prophesied of the Christian religion, the city of God, whose King and Founder is Christ; and of the grace of God, from which the proud are estranged, that they may fall; but the humble are filled with it that they may rise?' Augustin.—'One cannot but think Hannah had a respect to something higher than the quarrel between her and Peninnah, &c.' Ep. Patrick.—This indeed is expressly saying very little: but it shows what the mind of the writer had in contemplation.—As to Peninnah, on any interpretation, she can be considered no further, than merely as having given an occasion for this most sublime and sacred of heaven shall [f] he thunder upon them: the LORD shall [g] judge the ends of the earth; and [h] he shall give strength unto his King, and [i] exalt the horn of his [k] Anointed.

V. 11—26. In these verses we have Elkanah's and Eli's families observably interwoven; as if the historian intended to set the one over against the other, that they might set off one another. The devotion and good order of Elkanah's family aggravated the iniquity of Eli's; while the wickedness of Eli's sons made Samuel's early piety shine the more bright and illustrious.

I. How well things went in Elkanah's family.

1. Eli dismissed them with a blessing, v. 20. To give one out of many would not have been so rare, but to give up the only one, her Isaac, should by no means lose its reward. As when Abraham had offered Isaac, he received the promise of a numerous issue, (Gen. 22: 16, 17.) so did Hannah, when she had presented Samuel unto the Lord, a living sacrifice. What is lent to the Lord will certainly be repaid with interest, to our unspeakable advantage, and oftentimes in kind, v. 21.

2. they returned to their own habitation; (v. 11. and again v. 20.) it was very pleasant to attend at God's house, to bless Him, and to be blessed of Him. But they have a family at home that must be looked after, and thither they return, cheerfully leaving the dear little one behind them, knowing they left him in a good place; and it does not appear that he cried after them, but was as willing to stay as they were to leave him, so soon did he put away childish things, and behave like a man.

3. They kept up their constant attendance at the house of God, with their yearly sacrifice, v. 19. Having found the benefit of drawing near to God, they would omit no appointed season for it; and now they had one motive more to go than formerly. We may suppose they went to see their child oftener than once a year, for Shiloh was not ten miles from Ramah, but their annual visit is noticed, because then they brought their yearly sacrifice; and then Hannah fitted up her son (and some think oftener than once a year) with a new suit of clothes, a little coat, (v. 19.) and every thing belonging to it. Parents must take care that their children want nothing that is fit for them, whether they are with them or from them; but those that are dutiful and hopeful, and minister to the Lord, must be thought worthy of double care and kindness.

4. The child Samuel did very well. Four several times he is mentioned in these verses, and two things we are told of:

(1.) The service he did (v. 11, 18.) according to his capacity. Some little services perhaps he was employed in about the altar, though much under the age appointed by the law for the Levites' ministration; and because he did this with a pious disposition of mind, it is called ministering to the Lord, and great notice is taken of it. After awhile, he did his work so well, Eli appointed he should minister with a linen ephod as the priests did, (though he was no priest,) because he saw God was with him. Note, Little children must learn betimes to minister to the Lord; parents must train them up to it, and God will accept them; particularly, let them learn to respect their teachers, as Samuel did Eli. None can begin too soon to be religious. See Ps. 8: 2. and Matt. 21: 15, 16.

(2.) The blessing he received, He grew before the Lord, (v. 21.) and grew on (v. 26.) in strength and stature, and especially in wisdom and understanding, and fitness for business. Note, Those young people that serve God as well as they can, He will enable to improve, that they may serve Him better. They that are planted in God's house, shall flourish. He was in favor with God and with man. Note, It is a great encouragement to children to be tractable and virtuous, and good betimes, that if they be, both God and man will love them. Such children are the darlings both of heaven and earth. What is here said of Samuel, is said of our blessed Savior, that great Example, Luke 2: 52.

II. How ill things went in Eli's family, though seated at the very door of the tabernacle. The nearer the church, the further from God.

1. The abominable wickedness of Eli's sons, v. 12. It is emphatically expressed. Nothing appears to the contrary, but that Eli himself was a very good man, and, no doubt, had educated his sons well, giving them good instructions, setting them good examples, and putting up many a good prayer for them; yet, when they grew up, they proved sons of Belial, profane wicked men, arrant rakes; They knew not the Lord. They could not but have a notional knowledge of God and his law, a form of knowledge; (Rom. 2: 20.) yet because their practice was not accordingly, they are spoken of as wholly ignorant of God; they lived as if they knew nothing at all of God. Note, Parents cannot give grace to their children, nor does it run in the blood. Many, sincerely pious themselves, live to see their children notoriously impious and profane; the race is not to the swift. Eli was high priest and judge in Israel; his sons were priests by their birth; their character was sacred and honorable, and obliged them, for their reputation's sake, to observe decorum: they were resident at the fountain-head both of magistracy and ministry, yet they were sons of Belial, and their honor, power, and learning, made them so much the worse. They did not go to serve other gods, as those did that lived at a distance from the altar, for from the house of God they had their wealth and dignity; but, which

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. The mercies we receive in answer to prayers, should not only be acknowledged with thankful praise, but should lead us to rejoice in the Lord, as the Fountain of felicity and the God of salvation; and to anticipate with cheerful hope our complete deliverance, and victory over all the enemies of our souls.—An established judgment, concerning his perfect wisdom, power, love, and faithfulness, as exercised with sovereign authority, in the whole administration of his kingdom of providence and grace; and an habitual regard to his operations in all those events, which take place through the instrumentality of second causes, or rational agents, of whatever kind or character; will confirm our belief, that they, and they only, are safe and happy, who trust in Him and enjoy his favor; and that the present success, boastings, and confidence of the wicked, will shortly terminate in disappointment, misery, and despair; and the troubles of every humble believer, in triumph and exultation.—Vain and transitory are all distinctions, except that between the godly and the ungodly, which will swallow up the rest, and endure to all eternity. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—26. We have great encouragement to devote our children to the Lord in prayer from their birth, yea from their conception, to bring them early to his courts, and to train them up in his ways; for in this manner He generally takes them into his service, and gives them that spiritual and experimental knowledge of Himself, which fortifies the heart against temptation, and is the source of all godliness. (1 Chr. 28: 9.)—The neglect of properly educating children, and the indulgence of their wayward inclinations, is a sin which God severely chastises in his own people: because it seems to imply a contempt of his authority and special favor, and a disregard to his glory, as well as to their immortal souls; and because it tends to the most fatal crimes and apostasies, and to the utter decay of true religion. None are generally more abandoned, than the degenerate offspring of pious persons: and when such children of Belial have been admitted into the sacred ministry, and are allowed to go on with the forms of godliness, for the sake of emolument or authority; they prove the most fatal enemies to the cause of God, and the most destructive murderers of the souls of men.—Abuses, when once introduced, are soon sanctioned by custom; and customs and precedents acquire authority in the church, which it is deemed by a great majority very sinful to dissent from, or object to, even in the most peaceful manner.—When wicked men have thus gained one point for their own lucre or ambition, they will attempt another, and not shrink from the basest crimes to serve their selfish purposes. And is it not evident, that the whole system of papal antichristianity grew up, in this manner, to its full stature of spiritual domination and iniquity?—The beginnings should therefore be steadily resisted; and the rulers of the church are bound, by the strongest responsibility, to exercise their spiritual authority, in excluding from the sacred office the immoral of every description.

It seems Elkanah and Hannah, having so hopeful a son, (whom however they seldom saw,) were satisfied, though for several years they had no more children. It appears also that Eli, notwithstanding his misconduct in respect of his sons, really loved those who loved the Lord; and was so pleased with the conduct of Samuel, and with the piety of his parents, that his heart was enlarged in blessing them, and in praying that they might be recompensed, for devoting their only son to the service of God's sanctuary, by the comfort of more children. SCOTT.

Verse 22.

These 'women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle,' are said by some writers to have dedicated themselves, by courses, to the service of the sanctuary, doing any work pertaining to it, which belonged to their sex; such as spinning, weaving curtains, washing the garments, and various services of a similar nature: and by their attendance for these purposes, the priests at the sanctuary had an opportunity of forming an acquaintance with them. Their business, however, was doubtless professedly of a religious nature: but when those, who ought to have been their instructers in piety, used their influence to solicit them to wickedness, the most shameful consequences followed.—A more horrible abomination can scarcely be conceived: and it could hardly have been deemed credible, did not every age produce examples similar and not less atrocious, to the great dishonor of the Gospel, and to the hardening and rejoicing of the hearts of infidels and profligates. (Jer. 23: 13—15. Hos. 6: 8—10. Matt. 18: 7—9. 2 Pet. 2: 12—14.) SCOTT.

This last enormity induced Eli to reprove his sons; which he did in language very reasonable, and suited to the case of those who, though faulty, possess a tender conscience; but far too mild for such atrocious offenders. Indeed no words ought in this case to have sufficed; the execution of condign punishment upon them was absolutely due to the insulted honor of God, and needful to counteract, by a salutary example, the fatal effects of their crimes upon the minds of the people. To have finally excluded them from the execution of every priestly office, was the least that Eli, as the high priest and the judge of Israel, ought to have done: and if he had imitated the zeal of his tribe, 'who said to his father and mother, I have not seen him, neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor know his own children;' (Ex. 32: 27—29. Deut. 33: 9.) and if he had honored God more than his ungodly sons, he would have done it. (20.) There were priests enough without employing such monsters of iniquity.—The original signifies, that it was pleasing to the Lord to slay them. ID.

have the people's sin to answer for, as well as their own. He warns them of the danger they brought themselves into by it; (v. 25.) he intimates to them what God afterward told him, that the iniquity would not be purged with sacrifice nor offering, ch. 3: 14. If one man sin against another, the judge, i. e. the priest, who was appointed to be the judge in many cases, (Deut. 17: 9.) shall judge him, undertake his cause, arbitrate the matter, and make atonement; but if a man sin against the Lord, i. e. if a priest profane the holy things of the Lord, if a man that deals with God for others, do himself affront Him, who shall entreat for him? Their condition was deplorable indeed, when their own father could not appear for them. Sins against the remedy, the atonement itself, are most dangerous; treading under foot the blood of the covenant; for then there remains no more sacrifice, Heb. 10: 26.

Eli's reproof was too mild and gentle. Their crimes deserved a sharp rebuke, their temper needed it; the softness of his dealing would but harden them the more. When he said, It is no good report: he should have said, 'It is a shameful, scandalous thing, and not to be suffered!' Whether he dealt thus tenderly because he loved, or feared them, it certainly evinced his want of zeal for the honor of God and his sanctuary. He bound them over to God's judgment, but should have taken cognizance of their crimes himself, as high priest and judge, and have restrained and punished them. What he said was right, just and rational, but not enough. Note, It is sometimes necessary to put an edge on reproof. There are those that must be saved with fear, Jude 23.

3. Their obstinacy. They had long hardened their hearts, and now God, in righteous judgment, hardened their hearts, seared their consciences, and withheld the grace they had resisted and forfeited. Note, Those that are deaf to the reproofs of wisdom, are manifestly marked for ruin. The Lord has determined to destroy them, 2 Chron. 25: 16. See Prov. 29: 1. Immediately on this, Samuel's tractableness is again mentioned, v. 26. to shame their obstinacy. God's grace is his own; He denied it to the sons of the high priest, and gave it to the child of an obscure country Levite.

V. 27—36. Eli did not threaten his sons as he should, therefore God sent a prophet to reprove and threaten him, for strengthening their hands, by his indulgence, in their wickedness. If good men be wanting in their duty, and thereby contribute to the sin of sinners, they must expect both to hear of it, and to smart for it. Eli's family was now nearer to God than all the families of the earth, therefore He will punish them. The message is sent to Eli himself, because God would bring him to repentance and save him; not to his sons, whom He had determined to destroy. And it might have been a mean of awakening him to do his duty at last, and so prevent the judgment; but we do not find it had any great effect on him.

I. The prophet reminds him of the great things God had done for the house of his fathers, and for his family, v. 28. He advanced him to the priesthood, and entailed it on his family, thereby dignifying it above any of the families of Israel. He gave him honorable work, and settled upon him an honorable maintenance, a share out of all the offerings made by fire, v. 28. What could He have done more to engage them to be faithful to Him? Note, Distinguishing favors, especially those of the spiritual priesthood, are great aggravations of sin, and will be remembered against us in the day of account, if we profane our crown, and betray our trust, Deut. 32: 6. 2 Sam. 12: 7, 8.

II. He connived at his children, and thereby involved himself in their guilt; the indictment therefore runs against them all, v. 29. 'Thou honorest thy sons above Me;' i. e. 'Thou hadst rather see my offerings disgraced by their profanation of them, than see thy sons disgraced by a legal censure which ought to have been inflicted, even to suspension and deprivation.' Those that allow and countenance their children in any evil way, and do not use their authority to restrain and punish them, do in effect honor them more than God, being more tender of their reputation [and their own feelings] than of his glory, and more desirous to humor them than to honor Him. It is to be feared, that Eli himself, though he disliked and reproved the abuses, yet did not forbear to eat of the roast meat they sacrilegiously got; (v. 15.) he was a fat, heavy man, (ch. 4: 18.) therefore it is charged upon the whole family, (though Hophni and Phinehas were principally guilty,) Ye make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings. God gave them sufficient to feed them, but they made themselves fat, and served their lusts, with that which God was to be served with. See Hosea, 4: 8.

III. He declares the cutting off of the entail of the high-priesthood from his family, v. 30. I said, indeed, thy house, and the house of thy father Ithamar, (for from that younger son of Aaron, Eli was descended,) should walk before me for ever; but know now, thy commission is revoked. On what occasion the dignity of the high-priesthood was transferred from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, does not appear; but it seems it had been done, and Eli stood fair to have that honor perpetuated to his posterity; but observe, the promise carried its own condition along with it, They shall walk before me for ever; i. e. They shall have the honor, provided they faithfully do the service; walking before God is the great condition of the covenant, Gen. 17: 1. Some think there is a further reach in this recall of the grant, not only in the deposing shortly of the posterity of Eli, when Zadok, who descended from Eleazar, was put in Abiathar's room, but in the total abolition of the Levitical priesthood by the priesthood of Christ.

IV. He gives a good reason for this revocation, taken from a settled and standing rule of God's government, according to which, all must expect to be dealt with; (like that by which Cain was tried, Gen. 4: 7.) Them that honor Me, I will honor; and they that despise Me, shall be lightly esteemed. See Ps. 18: 25, 26. Particularly be it spoken, 1. To the everlasting reputation of religion and serious godliness, that it gives honor to God, and puts honor on men. The way to be truly great, is to be truly good. If we humble and deny ourselves in any thing to honor God, and have a single eye to Him in it, we may depend on this promise, He will put the best honor on us. See John 12: 26. 2. Be it spoken to the everlasting reproach of impiety and profaneness, that this dishonors God, and will bring dishonor on men, for they that despise God shall be lightly esteemed. They shall see themselves despised by all mankind, their names a reproach; when they are gone, their memory shall rot, and when they rise again, it shall be to everlasting shame and contempt, Ps. 79: 12.

V. He foretells the particular judgments, which should come on his family, to its perpetual ignominy. A terrible curse it is; and shows how jealous God is in the matters of his worship, and how ill He takes it, when those who are obliged,

CHAP. III.

The Lord reveals Himself to the child Samuel, and informs him of his purposes against the house of Eli, 1—14. Samuel, adjured by Eli, tells him the vision; and Eli answers submissively, 15—18. Samuel is established to be a prophet of the Lord, 19—21.

AND [a] the child Samuel ministered unto the LORD before Eli. And [b] the word of the LORD was precious in by their character and profession, to preserve and advance the interests of his glory, are false to their trust, and betray them. If God's ministers be vicious and profane, how much sorer punishment will they be thought worthy of, here and for ever, than other sinners! Let such read the doom here passed on Eli's house, and tremble.

The arm should be cut off, which was not stretched out to restrain and punish. Instead of using the wisdom, gravity, experience, and authority, of his age, for the service of God and the support of religion, he had suffered the infirmities of age to make him more cool and remiss in his duty, therefore none of his posterity should live to be old, (v. 31—33.) but should all die in the midst of the years of their service; so that though the family should not be extinct, yet it should never be considerable, nor should any of it come to be eminent in their day. Patrick relates, out of some Jewish writer, that, long after this, there being a family in Jerusalem, none of which commonly lived above 18 years, upon search it was found that they descended from the house of Eli.

All their comforts should be imbittered. (1.) The comfort in the sanctuary, its wealth and prosperity; which was fulfilled in the Philistines' invasions, and their mischiefs, by which the country was impoverished, (ch. 13: 19.) and, no doubt, the priests' incomes were thereby very much impaired. The captivity of the ark was such an act of hostility, committed on God's habitation, as broke Eli's heart. As it is a blessing to a family to see peace on Israel, (Ps. 128: 5, 6.) so the contrary is a sore judgment on a family, especially of priests. (2.) Comfort of their children. 'The man of thine, whom I shall not cut off by an untimely death, shall live to be a blot and burden to the family, a scandal and vexation to his relations; he shall be to consume thine eyes, and grieve thine heart, either for his foolishness, sickliness, wickedness, or poverty.' Grief for a dead child is great, but for a bad child often greater.

Their substance should be wasted, and they reduced to extreme poverty, v. 36. 'He that is left alive in thy house, shall have little joy of his life.' (1.) He shall beg for the smallest alms, a piece of silver, and the word signifies the least piece, and a morsel of bread. See how this answered the sin. Note, Those who could not be content without dainties and varieties, are brought, they or theirs, to want necessaries, and the Lord is righteous in it. (2.) He shall beg for the meanest office; Put me into somewhat belonging to the priesthood, so the original, make me as one of the hired servants; the fittest place for a prodigal. Plenty and power are forfeited, when abused. This, it is probable, was fully accomplished, when Abiathar, who was of Eli's race, was deposed by Solomon for treason, and he and his turned out of office in the temple, (1 Kings 2: 26, 27.) by which it is easy to think his posterity were reduced to the extremities here described.

God would shortly begin to execute these judgments in the death of Hophni and Phinehas, the sad tidings of which Eli himself should live to hear; This shall be a sign to thee, v. 34. It was fulfilled, ch. 4: 11.

Lastly, In the midst of all these threatenings against the house of Eli, here is mercy promised to Israel, v. 35. I will raise me up a faithful priest. 1. This was fulfilled in Zadoc, one of the family of Eleazar, who came into Abiathar's place, in the beginning of Solomon's reign, and was faithful to his trust; and the high priests were of his posterity as long as the Levitical priesthood continued. Note, The wickedness of ministers, though it destroy themselves, yet shall not destroy the ministry. The high priest is here said to walk before God's anointed, i. e. David and his seed, because he wore the breast-plate of judgment, which he was to consult, not in common cases, but for the king, in affairs of state. 2. It has its full accomplishment in the priesthood of Christ, that merciful and faithful High Priest, whom God raised up when the Levitical priesthood was thrown off, who in all things did his Father's mind, and for whom God would build a sure house, build it on a rock, so that the gates of hell cannot prevail against it.

CHAP. III. V. 1—10. In the foregoing ch. we had Samuel a young priest, in this, a young prophet; God in an extraordinary manner revealing Himself to him, and in him reviving, if not commencing, prophecy in Israel.

To make way for the account of God's revealing Himself first to Samuel, we are here told, 1. How industrious Samuel was in serving God, according to his place and capacity, v. 1. And it was a preparative for the honors God intended him; he that was thus faithful in a little, was soon after intrusted with much more. Let those that are young, be humble and diligent, and they will find that the surest way to preferment. Those are fittest to rule, that have learned to obey. 2. How scarce a thing prophecy then was; The word of the Lord was precious in those days. Now and then a man of God was employed, on an extraordinary occasion, (as ch. 2: 27.) but there was no settled prophet. And the rarity of prophecy made it the more precious, in the account of all those that knew how rightly to value it. It was precious, for what there was, (it seems,) was private, there was no open vision, that is, none were publicly known to have visions. Perhaps, the impiety and impurity that prevailed in the tabernacle, and, no doubt, corrupted the whole nation, had provoked God, as a token of his displeasure, to withdraw the Spirit of prophecy.

1. Eli was retired, v. 2. he went to bed betimes, being unfit for business, and soon weary of it, or perhaps loving his ease too well. Probably, he kept his chamber much, which gave his sons the greater liberty. And he sought retirement the more, because his eyes began to wax dim, a just affliction for winking at his sons' faults.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 27—36. If the servants of God yield to temptation, and repeatedly commit iniquity; He will persevere in his rebukes and chastenings, till He has brought them to repentance: and in this process the offenders will suffer unspeakable anguish.—That improper regard to the interests of his family, which induces a man to offend God, often proves the immediate cause of its ruin; whilst a disregard, shown by any one, to all personal or relative interests, when the glory of God is concerned, forms the best method of promoting the welfare of his posterity.—Many of the Lord's offending people live to witness terrible effects of their misconduct; but how would it grieve their hearts, if they could foresee all the future consequences of every kind, to their families, and to the church, and in hardening sinners to their destruction! Let us endeavor to conceive of them, that we may be led to greater abhorrence and dread of sin, and more constant watchfulness and prayer: for these things were written for our warning, that we might strive against the beginnings of iniquity, and train up our families for the Lord. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. Samuel is supposed at this time to have been about 12 years of age; and he was early prepared to enter on the prophetical office, for which the Lord intended him. (Jer. 1: 5.)—From the death of Moses, no more than two prophets have been mentioned; (except Deborah, called a prophetess,) and these only delivered an occasional message, and then retired; so that their names are not recorded. (2: 27. Judg. 6: 8—10.) Samuel was therefore the first eminent prophet after Moses; and with him prophecy was openly established: so that for several ages prophets were raised up in Israel by a regular succession. SCOTT.

those days; there was no open vision.

2 And it came to pass at that time, when Eli was laid down in his place, and [c] his eyes began to wax dim, that he could not see;

3 And ere [d] the lamp of God went out in [e] the temple of the LORD, where the ark of God was, and Samuel was laid down to sleep;

4 That the LORD [f] called Samuel: and he answered, Here am I.

5 And he ran unto Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou calledst me. And he said, I called not; lie down again. And he went and lay down.

6 And the LORD called yet again, Samuel. And Samuel arose and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me. And he answered, I called not, [g] my son; lie down again.

7 * Now Samuel [h] did not yet know the LORD, neither was the word of the LORD yet revealed unto him.

8 And the LORD called Samuel again [i] the third time. And he arose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me. And Eli perceived that the LORD had called the child.

9 Therefore Eli said unto Samuel, Go, lie down; and it shall be, if he call thee, that thou shalt say, [k] Speak, LORD, for thy servant heareth. So Samuel went, and lay down in his place.

10 And the LORD came, and stood, and called as at other times, Samuel, Samuel. Then Samuel answered, Speak, for thy servant heareth.

11 And the LORD said to Samuel, Behold,

II. Samuel was laid down to sleep, near to Eli's room, ready within call, if the old man should want any thing in the night, perhaps to read to him, if he could not sleep. He thus chose Samuel, because of the towardly disposition he observed in him. Let those that are afflicted in their children, thank God if they have any about them, in whom they are comforted. It should seem he lay somewhere near the holy place, and went to bed before the branch-lamps of the candlestick went out, (the main lamp never went out,) probably, toward midnight; till that time, Samuel had been employing himself in some good exercise or other, reading and prayer, or perhaps cleaning or making ready the holy place; and then went softly to his bed. Then we may expect God's gracious visits, when we are constant and diligent in our duty.

III. God called him by name, and he took it for Eli's call, v. 4: 5. Patrick thinks the call was out of the most holy place; and so the Chaldee, A voice was heard out of the temple of the Lord; but Eli, though it is likely he lay nearer, heard it not; yet, possibly, it might come some other way. Samuel's industry, and readiness to wait on Eli, are a good example to servants, to come when called; and to the younger, not only to submit to the elder, but to be careful and tender of them. Unacquainted with the visions of the Almighty, he took that to be only Eli's call, which was really the call of God. Such mistakes we make oftener than we think of. God calls by his Word, and we take it to be only the call of the minister; calls by his providences, and we look only at the instruments. His voice cries, and the impressions of it are soon lost; sinners lie down again, and their convictions come to nothing: but here and there a man of wisdom understands it to be his voice

IV. The same call was repeated, and the same mistake made, a second and third time, v. 6—9. The call which divine grace designs to make effectual, shall be repeated till it is so; i. e. till we come at the call, for the purpose of God, according to which we are called, shall certainly stand. Samuel did not yet apprehend, (v. 7.) the way in which God reveals Himself to his servants the prophets; perhaps he had been sooner aware of a divine revelation, had it come in a dream or a vision; but this was a way he had not only not known himself, but not heard of. The witness of the Spirit in the hearts of the faithful, is often thus mistaken, by which means they lose the comfort of it; and the strivings of the Spirit with the consciences of sinners are likewise often mistaken, and so the benefit of their convictions is lost: God speaketh once, yea twice, but man perceiveth it not, Job 33: 14. Samuel went to Eli this second and third time; But there was a special providence in it, for hereby, at length, Eli perceived the Lord had called the child, v. 8. He had reason to look upon this as a further token of God's displeasure. It would also put him on inquiring what it was God said to Samuel, and abundantly satisfy him of the truth and certainty of what should be delivered. Thus even the infirmities and mistakes of those whom God employs, are overruled by Infinite Wisdom, and made serviceable to his purposes.

V. At length, Samuel was put into a posture to receive a message from God. Eli, perceiving it was the voice of God, Samuel heard, gave him instructions what to say, v. 9. This was honestly done; for, though slighted himself, he directed Samuel how to entertain God's call; whereas, had he been envious of the honor done to Samuel, he would have done what he could to deprive him of it; but he was of a better spirit; he gave him the best advice he could, to forward his advancement. Thus the elder should, without grudging, do the utmost to assist and improve the younger that are rising up, though they see themselves likely to be darkened and eclipsed by them, John 1: 30. He must call himself God's servant, must desire to know the mind of God. Note, Then we may expect God will speak to us, when we set ourselves to hearken to what He says, Ps. 85: 8. Hab. 2: 1. When we read and hear the Word of God, we should be thus disposed, submitting our souls to the commanding light and power of it; Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. It would seem God spake the fourth time, in a way somewhat different from the other; He stood and called; which intimates, there was now some visible appearance of the divine glory, a vision that stood before Samuel, like that before Eliphaz, though he could not discern the form thereof, Job 4: 16. This satisfied him it was not Eli, for he now saw the voice that spake with him, as it is expressed, Rev. 1: 12. His call was powerful and effectual, when He called him by name, and so brought it particularly to him, as Saul, Saul. Thus God called to Abraham by name, Gen. 22: 1. Samuel said as he was taught, Speak, for thy servant heareth. Note, Good words should be put into children's mouths betimes, and apt expressions of pious and devout affections, by which they may be prepared for a better acquaintance with divine things, and trained up to a holy converse with them. Teach young people what they shall say, for they cannot order their speech by reason of darkness. Samuel now lay still and listened. The more sedate and composed our spirits are, the better prepared they are for divine discoveries. Let all tumultuous thoughts and passions be kept under, and every thing be quiet and serene in the soul, and then we are fit to hear from God. All must be silent, when He speaks. Samuel was by this brought acquainted with the words of God, and visions of the Almighty; and this ere the lamp of God went out, (v. 3.) in the temple of the Lord, which some of the Jewish writers put a mystical sense upon: i. e. say they, Ere God make the sun of one righteous man to set, He makes the sun of another righteous man to rise. Smith, ex Kimchi.

cause perhaps Eli did not give so much regard to that as he ought to have done. Divine threatenings, the less they are heeded, the surer they will come, and the heavier they will fall. 1. It is the iniquity that he knoweth, v. 13. The man of God told him of it, and many a time his own conscience had told him of it. O what a great deal of guilt and corruption is there in us, concerning which we may say, 'It is the iniquity which our own heart knoweth; we are conscious to ourselves of it!' His sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. Or, as the Heb. he frowned not upon them; he did not show his dislike to the degree he ought to have done: he did not punish them, nor deprive them of their power to do mischief, which, as a father, high priest, and judge, he might have done. Note, (1.) Sinners do by their own wickedness make themselves vile. (Jam. 1: 14.) Sin is vile, and vilifies more than any thing, Ps. 15: 4. (2.) Those that do not restrain the sins of others, when in their power, make themselves partakers of the guilt, and will be charged as accessaries. Those in authority will have a great deal to answer for, if they make not the sword they bear, a terror to evil workers.

2. The punishment, is that I have spoken concerning his house; (v. 12, 13.) that a curse should be entailed on his family from generation to generation. The particulars of this curse we had before; they are not here repeated, but it is added, (1.) That when that sentence began to be executed, every Israelite would be struck with terror and astonishment, (v. 11.) to hear of the slaying of Eli's sons, the breaking of Eli's neck, and the dispersion of Eli's family. Lord, how terrible art Thou in thy judgments! If this be done in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? Note, God's judgments on others should affect us with a holy fear, Ps. 119: 120. (2.) That these direful first-fruits of the execution would be certain earnests of the progress and full accomplishment of it, v. 12. It is intimated it might, possibly, be some time before He would begin, but let them not call that forbearance an acquittance; for when at length He does begin, He will make thorough work of it, and though He stay long, He will strike home. (3.) That no room should be left for hope that this sentence might be reversed, and the execution stayed or mitigated, v. 14. God would not revoke the sentence, nor come to a composition for the forfeiture. This was the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, that there were iniquities which they would not purge; but the blood of Christ cleanses from sin, and secures all those that by faith are interested in it, from that eternal death which is the wages of sin.

II. The delivery of this message to Eli. Observe, 1. Samuel's modest concealment of it, v. 15. (1.) He lay till the morning, and, we may well suppose, awake, pondering on what he had heard. After we have received the spiritual food of God's Word, it is good to compose ourselves, and give it time to digest. (2.) He opened the doors of the house of the Lord, in the morning, as he used to do, being up first in the tabernacle. Note, Those to whom God manifests Himself, He makes and keeps low in their own eyes, and willing to stoop to any thing by which they may be serviceable to his glory, though but as door-keepers in his house. One would have expected that Samuel should have been so full of his vision, as to tell it among his companions; but he modestly keeps it to himself, and silently goes on in his business. Our secret communion with God is not to be proclaimed on the house tops. (3.) He feared to show Eli the vision. Perhaps he was afraid Eli would be angry with him, and chide him: we will suppose it was rather because he was afraid to grieve and trouble the good old man. If he had run immediately with the tidings to Eli, it would have looked as if he desired the woful day, and hoped to build his own family upon the ruin of Eli's, therefore it became him not to be forward to do it; no good man can take pleasure in bringing evil tidings, especially not Samuel to Eli, the pupil to the tutor whom he loves and honors.

2. As soon as ever Eli heard Samuel stirring, he called for him, probably, to his bed-side; and having perceived before, that God had spoken to him, he obliged him, not only by importunity, but by an adjuration, to tell him what it was God had told him. A good man desires to be acquainted with all the will of God, whether it make for him, or against him. His adjuration, v. 7. may intimate the fearful doom of unfaithful watchmen; if they warn not sinners, they bring on themselves that wrath and curse, which they should have denounced, in God's name, against those that go on still in their trespasses.

3. Samuel's faithful delivery of his message at last, v. 18. He told him every whit; when he saw he must tell him, he never minced the matter, to blunt what was sharp, or gild what was bitter, but delivered the message as plainly and fully as he received it, not shunning to declare the whole counsel of God. Christ's ministers must deal thus faithfully.

4. Eli's pious acquiescence in it. He understood the sentence to intend only a temporal punishment, and the entail of disgrace and poverty on his posterity, not a final separation of them from the favor of God, therefore he did not repine, because he knew the demerits of his family; nor intercede to reverse the sentence, because God had ratified it with a solemn oath, of which He would not repent: but humbly resigns himself to God's will, as Aaron, in a case not much unlike; (Lev. 10: 3.) He held his peace. He lays down this satisfying truth, 'It is the Lord; from whose bar there lies no appeal, and against whose sentence there lies no exception; whose power cannot be resisted, or justice arraigned, or sovereignty contested. It is the Lord, who will thus sanctify and glorify Himself, and it is highly fit He should. It is the Lord, with whom there is no unrighteousness, who never did nor ever will do any wrong to any of his creatures, nor exact more than their iniquity deserves.' He infers from it this satisfying conclusion, 'Let Him do what seemeth Him good; I have nothing to say against his proceedings; He is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works, therefore his will be done. I will bear the indignation of the Lord,

Verse 12.

(2: 27—36.) Probably this message was sent to Eli some years before his death; and this forbearance of God tended to harden the hearts of Eli's sons, in presumptuous expectations of impunity. SCOTT.

Verse 14.

The sins of pious individuals among Eli's posterity would be pardoned, through the sacrifice of Christ, for their eternal salvation: but the Lord had irrevocably determined, that no number of sin-offerings or oblations should prevail with Him, to continue that family in the high priesthood, or to deliver them from the awful temporal judgments which had been denounced; as perhaps both Eli and his sons hoped would be the case. (Num. 15: 30, 31. Is. 22: 8—14.) SCOTT.

Verse 15.

In the morning, Samuel opened the gates of the court of the tabernacle, into which the people came to worship, as if nothing had occurred; neither elated with the distinction, nor neglecting his business, nor mentioning the matter, nor showing the least disrespect to Eli; but rather, through his great deference and affection for him, being reluctant to inform him of the distressing message. SCOTT.

Verses 16—18.

Eli was solicitous to know the revelation which God had made to Samuel, and afraid that he would not fully inform him of it: but he must no doubt have been greatly alarmed and distressed, when he heard the awful message, from the mouth of a child, who was so respectfully affectionate to him, and dependent on him; and whom he could not possibly suspect of artifice, or corrupt motives, or harshness of language. Yet his answer is very remarkable. He reflected on the wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God, as well as on his sovereignty. He acknowledged He had a right to do as He saw good, and was assured He would do nothing wrong. He was conscious that he deserved the terrible sentence, and acquiesced in the will of God, casting himself entirely on his mercy.—The meekness, patience, and humility of these words are very admirable, and prove that Eli was truly penitent and pious: (M. R. y.—Lev. 10: 3. Job 1: 20, 22. Ps. 39: 9, 10.) though in his old and infirm age, he had not sufficient

V. 19—21. We have here an account of the further honor done Samuel as a prophet.

1 The Lord was with him. All our increase in wisdom and grace, is owing to the presence of God with us; it is all in all to our growth. God honored Samuel, (I.) By further manifestations of Himself to him. Samuel had faithfully delivered the messages he was intrusted with, therefore God employed him again in his service, v. 21. Note, God will graciously repeat his visits to those that receive them right. (2.) By fulfilling what He spake by him; v. 19. Whatever Samuel said, as a prophet, proved true, and was accomplished in its season. Probably, there were some remarkable instances of the truth of his predictions, that happened soon after, which confirmed those that were afterward to be fulfilled, and gave general satisfaction as to his mission. (Isa. 44: 26.)

2. Israel did him honor. They all knew, and owned, that Samuel was established to be a prophet, v. 20. Early piety will be the greatest honor of young people, and bring them, as much as any thing, and as soon, into reputation. Them that honor God He will honor. He that began betimes to be good, soon came to do good. His established commission from God, and established reputation with the people, gave him a great opportunity of shining as a light in Israel. When old Eli was rejected, young Samuel was established; for God will never leave Himself without a witness, nor his church without a guide.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—9. The predictions in the foregoing ch. concerning the ruin of Eli's house, here begin to be fulfilled; how long after, does not appear; but it was not long. With such sinners God often makes quick work.

The first words, Samuel's words came to all Israel, seem not to have any reference to the following story, as if it was by any direction of Samuel's, that the Israelites went out against the Philistines; had they consulted him, it might have stood them in more stead than the ark did; but perhaps they despised his youth, and he did not as yet interpose in public affairs; nor do we find any mention of his name henceforward, till some years after; (ch. 7: 3.) only his word came to all Israel; i. e. the piously disposed, from all parts, had recourse to him as a prophet, and advised with him. Perhaps, it is meant of his prophecy against the house of Eli, that was generally known and talked of, and all that were serious and observing, compared the events here related, when this came to pass, with that prophecy, and saw it accomplished in them.

I. This war with the Philistines, v. 1. was to throw off their yoke, and would have succeeded better, had they first repented and reformed, and so begun their work at the right end. It is computed, this was about the middle of the 40 years' dominion of the Philistines over Israel, (Judg. 1: 31.) soon after the death of Samson; so Patrick, who thinks the slaughter he made at his death, might encourage this attempt: but Lightfoot reckons it 40 years after Samson's death, for so long Eli judged, v. 18.

But sin, the accursed thing, was in the camp, and gave their enemies all the advantage against them, they could wish for, v. 2.

II. The measures they concerted for another engagement; a council of war was called, and, instead of resolving to fast and pray, and amend their lives, so ill taught were they, (and no wonder, when they had such teachers,) that, 1. They quarrelled with God for appearing against them; (v. 3.) Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us? They needed not to go far to find out the cause of God's displeasure; it was plain enough Israel had sinned, though they were not willing to see it and own it. Note, The foolishness of man perverts his way, and then his heart frets against the Lord, and finds fault with Him. 2. They imagined they could oblige Him to appear for them the next time, by bringing the ark into their camp. So they sent to Shiloh for the ark, and Eli had not courage enough to oppose it, but sent his ungodly sons, Hophni and Phinehas, along with it, at least permitted them to go, though he knew that wherever they went, the curse of God went along with them. Now see here, (1.) The profound veneration they had for the ark. It was, by institution, a visible token of God's presence; and now they thought, by paying great respect to it, they should prove themselves to be Israelites indeed, and effectually engage God Almighty to appear in their favor. Note, It is common for those that have estranged themselves from the vitals of religion, to discover a great fondness for the ritual and external observance of it; for those that even deny the power of godliness, care not to have, but to have in admiration, the form of it. And yet indeed they did but make an idol of the ark, and looked upon it to be as much an image of the God of Israel, as those which the heathen worshipped, were of their gods. To worship the true God, and not to worship Him as God, is, in effect, not to worship Him at all. (2.) Their egregious folly, in thinking that if they had that in their camp, it would certainly save them out of the hands of their

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We, who are favored with the written Word, and the public preaching of the Gospel by ministers of varied talents and endowments, can scarcely conceive how greatly our forefathers, in days of ignorance and persecution, valued a Bible, or the opportunity of hearing a faithful sermon; and how much numbers still value them in different parts of the world. (Deut. 31: 10—13.) This should teach us to be thankful, and to improve our privileges, lest the Lord should show us their preciousness, by the loss of them.—He disposes of his special favors in wise and holy sovereignty, without confining Himself to age, station, or office in his church; but He orders every thing so as to correct or punish such as offend Him, and to 'honor those who honor Him.'—Docility, diligence, and a humble, self-denying disposition in youth, are happy indications of an honorable and useful life.—Young persons ought to behave with assiduous and attentive kindness to the aged; and to show a submissive respect to their superiors, even when faulty, and under divine rebukes. But no deference to men, because every way superior to themselves, must influence those, whom the Lord employs as his messengers, to conceal or mutilate their message: and they are most unwise in their spiritual concerns, who wish to be flattered; nay, who do not desire above all things to know the whole of the revealed will of God, and the worst of their own state and case.—Presumptuous hopes of impunity, because the Lord is long-suffering, ruin multitudes who postpone repentance till God hath 'sworn in his wrath that they shall not enter into his rest.'—If temporal sufferings may be so terrible, as to 'cause the ears of all who hear of them to tingle,' what will be the everlasting punishment of the wicked! Let us then humble ourselves before God, ere the door of mercy be for ever shut: let us accept of his chastisement; submit to his sovereignty; cast ourselves on his mercy, and seek his salvation; and study to show our repentance, not only by good words, but by good works; even restraining others from sin, and even frowning upon them, and faithfully improving every talent committed to us. Samuel, it seems, was after this frequently favored with revelations from God, which he delivered to the people: and as these were punctually accomplished, his appointment to be 'a prophet of the LORD,' was known and acknowledged, throughout the land. NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. Some are of opinion, that these events happened about the middle of the 40 years, during which the Philistines oppressed Israel: but on that supposition, Samson must have been born at least 20 years before that oppression began, which does not accord with the narrative: (Notes, Judg. 13: 1, 4, 5.) and if his exploits only made way for the defeats recorded in this chapter; how could it all Israel. Now Israel went out against the Philistines to battle, and pitched beside [a] Eben-ezer: and the Philistines pitched in [b] Aphek.

2 And the Philistines [c] put themselves in array against Israel: and when * they joined battle, [d] Israel was smitten before the Philistines; [e] and they slew of † the army in the field about four thousand men.

3 And when the people were come into the camp, the elders of Israel said, [f] Wherefore hath the LORD smitten us to-day before the Philistines? [g] Let us ‡ fetch [h] the ark of the covenant of the LORD out of Shiloh unto us, that when it cometh among us, [i] it may save us out of the hand of our enemies.

4 So the people sent to Shiloh, that they might bring from thence the ark of the covenant of the LORD of hosts, [k] which dwelleth between [l] the cherubims: and the two sons of Eli, [m] Hophni and Phinehas, were there [n] with the ark of the covenant of God.

5 And when the ark of the covenant of the LORD came into the camp, [o] all Israel shouted with a great shout, so that the earth rang again.

6 And when the Philistines heard the noise of the shout, they said, [p] What meaneth the noise of this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? And they understood that the ark of the LORD was come into the camp.

7 And the Philistines [q] were afraid; for they said, God is come into the camp. And they said, Wo unto us! for there hath not been such a thing § heretofore.

8 Wo unto us! who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty Gods? these are the Gods that [r] smote the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness.

9 [s] Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines, that ye be not servants unto the Hebrews, [t] as they have been to you: ‖ quit yourselves like men, and fight.

10 And the Philistines fought, and [u] Israel was smitten, and they fled [x] every man into his tent; and there was [y] a very great slaughter: for there fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen.

enemies, and bring victory back to their side. Moses prayed, when the ark set forward; but here were no proper means used to engage God to favor them; what good then would the ark do them, the shell without the kernel? God had plainly enough intimated in his law, that when they were settled in Canaan, his ark should be settled in the place He should choose, (Deut. 12: 5, 11.) and that they must come to it, and not it to them. How then could they expect any advantage by it, when they had not a just and legal possession of it, nor any warrant to stir it from its place? Instead of honoring God by what they did, they really affronted Him. Nay, had there been nothing else to invalidate their expectations, how could they expect it should bring a blessing, when Hophni and Phinehas brought it? It would have given too much countenance to their villany, had the ark done any kindness to Israel, while in the hands of those graceless priests.

III. The camp of Israel, when the ark was brought into it, v. 5. Now, sure of victory, they gave a triumphant shout, as if the day was without fail their own, intending by this to animate themselves and to intimidate their adversaries. The two armies lay so near, that the Philistines heard the shout of the Israelites. They soon understood what it was they triumphed in, (v. 6.) and were afraid of the consequences. Natural conscience suggests this, that those are in a woful condition, who have God against them; yet see what gross notions they had of the divine presence, as if the God of Israel was not so much in the camp before the ark came thither; which may very well be excused in them, since the notions the Israelites themselves had of that presence were no better. In the days of old, it had wrought wonders, v. 8.

Here they were as much out in their history as in their divinity; the plagues of Egypt were inflicted before the ark was made, and before Israel came into the wilderness; but some confused traditions they had of wonders wrought by or for Israel, when this ark was carried before them, which they attributed, not to Jehovah, but to the ark; taking the ark for God, as well they might, when the Israelites themselves idolized it. Yet it should seem they scarcely believed themselves, when they spoke thus formidably of these mighty gods, but only bantered; for, instead of retreating, or proposing conditions of peace, they stirred up one another to fight so much the more stoutly; (v. 9.) the commanders inspiring bold and generous thoughts in the minds of their soldiers, when they bid them remember how they had lorded it over Israel, and what an intolerable grief and shame it would be, if they flinched now, and suffered Israel to lord it over them.

V. 10—11. Here is a short account of the issue of this battle.

I. Israel was smitten, the army dispersed, and totally routed, not retiring into the camp as before, (v. 2.) when they hoped to rally again, but returning to their tents, every man shifting for his own safety, and making the best of his way home, desparing to make head any more, and 30,000 slain in the field of battle, v. 10. they failed, for the Rock had sold them. A good cause often suffers for the sake of the bad men that undertake it. External privileges will secure none that abuse them, and do not live up to them. The ark in the camp will add nothing to its strength, when there is an Achan in it.

II. The ark itself was taken by the Philistines; and Hophni and Phinehas, who, it is likely, kept close to it, and when it was in danger, ventured far in the defence of it, because by it they got their living, were both slain, v. 11. To this sad event the Psalmist refers; (Ps. 78: 61, 64.)

be said, tha the began to deliver Israel?—Others, however, think that the 40 years, during which the Philistines oppressed Israel, ended about seven months after Eli's death, when the ark of God was restored: and in that case the subsequent oppression by the Philistines must be considered, as distinct from that mentioned in the book of Judges. The chronology of these times is, in fact, to us abstruse and uncertain. [See Hales' table, vol. 1, p. 330.] (Notes, Judg. 3: 11. 11: 26.)—Perhaps Samuel was at this time about 20 years of age.

These elders seem to have been miserably sunk in ignorance and formality, which was the genuine consequence of the impiety of the priests. Though the nation was ripe for dreadful judgments, they had no idea that the defeat they had received was intended as a warning to repent; and they proposed a very ignorant and presumptuous expedient to secure the assistance of JEHOVAH. But not only papists, by worshipping the bread, but protestants, by trusting in the outward and visible sign, to the neglect of the inward and spiritual grace; do much as did the Israelites here, in trusting to the mere presence of the ark. The Philistines probably thought, that JEHOVAH was indeed a God, the God of Israel; but then so was dagon a god, the god of Philistia. (5: 1, 2. Judg. 16: 23, 24.) This therefore did not destroy their hope of gaining the mastery by the help of their god; and it tended on this occasion to increase their intrepidity and resolution. (M. R.)

1. The slaughter of the priests, considering their bad character, was no great loss to Israel, but it was a dreadful judgment on the house of Eli. The word which God had spoken, was fulfilled in it, ch. 2: 33, 34. The Lord is known by those judgments which He executeth. It is true, the sword devours one as well as another, but these were waited for of the sword, marked for vengeance. They were out of their place; what had they to do in the camp? When men leave the way of their duty, they shut themselves out of God's protection. But this was not all; they had betrayed the ark, by bringing it into danger, without a warrant from God, and this filled the measure of their iniquities. But, 2. The taking of the ark was a very great judgment on Israel, a certain token of God's hot displeasure against them. Now they are made to see their folly in trusting to external privileges, when their wickedness had forfeited them. Now they are convinced God will not be prescribed to by vain and foolish men, and that though He has bound us to his ark, He has not bound Himself to it, but will rather deliver it into the hands of his sworn enemies, than suffer it to be profaned by his false friends, and countenance their superstition. Let none think to shelter themselves from the wrath of God, under the cloak of a visible profession, for there will be those cast into utter darkness, that have eaten and drunken in Christ's presence.

V. 12—18. Tidings are here brought to Shiloh of the fatal issue of the battle. Ill news flies fast. No place was so nearly concerned as Shiloh; thither therefore an express posted away immediately: as it was a man of Benjamin, the Jews fancy it was Saul; he rent his clothes, and put earth upon his head; by these signs to proclaim to all that saw him as he ran, the sorrowful news, and to show how much himself was affected with it, v. 12. Here we are told,

I. How the city received it. Eli sat in the gate, v. 13, 18. but the messenger was loath to tell him first, therefore passed him by, and told it in the city, with all the aggravating circumstances; and now both the ears of every one that heard it, tingled, as was foretold; their hearts trembled, and every face gathered blackness. All the city cried out, v. 13. and well they might; for besides that this was a calamity to all Israel, it was a particular loss to Shiloh, and the ruin of that place. For though the ark was soon rescued out of the hands of the Philistines, yet it never returned to Shiloh again; their candlestick was removed out of its place, because they had left their first love, and their city dwindled, and sunk, and came to nothing. Now God forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, they having driven Him from them; and the tribe of Ephraim, which had for 340 years been blessed with the presence of the ark in it, lost the honor, Ps. 78: 60, 67.) and, some time after, it was transferred to the tribe of Judah, the mt. Zion which He loved, as it follows there, v. 68. because the men of Shiloh knew not the day of their visitation. This abandoning of Shiloh, Jerusalem is long after reminded of, and bid to take warning by, Go see what I did to Shiloh.

II. What a fatal blow it was to old Eli. 1. Though old, blind, and heavy, yet he could not keep his chamber, when sensible the glory of Israel lay at stake, but placed himself by the way-side, to receive the first intelligence; for his heart trembled for the ark of God, v. 13. And now the threatening comes to his mind, that he should see an enemy in God's habitation; ch. 2: 32. and perhaps his heart reproached him for not using his authority, to prevent the carrying of the ark into the camp. Note, All good men lay the interests of God's church nearer their hearts, than any secular interest or concern of their own, and cannot but be in pain and fear for them, if, at any time, they are in peril. How can we be easy, if the ark be not safe? 2. With what grief he received the tidings. He is told, there is an express come from the army, who relates the story to him very distinctly, and with great confidence, having himself been an eye-witness of it, v. 16, 17. He does not interrupt the narrative with any passionate exclamations, though it informs of the defeat of the army, of the death of his two sons, but waits to hear of the ark; and if the messenger could but have said, 'Yet the ark of God is safe, and we are bringing that home,' his joy for that would have overcome his grief for all the other disasters, and have made him easy; but when the messenger concludes his story with, The ark of God is taken, he is struck to the heart, his spirits fail, and, it should seem, he swooned away, fell off his seat, and partly with the fainting, and partly with the fall, he died immediately, and never spoke a word more. What pious Israelite can live with any comfort when God's ordinances are removed? Farewell all in this world, even life itself, if the ark be gone So fell the high priest and judge of Israel, when he had lived within two of 100 years, and judged Israel about 40 years; thus did his sun set under a cloud, thus were the folly and wickedness of sons whom he had indulged, his ruin at last. Thus does God sometimes set marks of his displeasure on good men in this life, who have misconducted themselves, that others may hear, and fear, and take warning.

V. 14—22. We have here another melancholy story that carries on the desolations of Eli's house. The tidings cost the wife of Phinehas her life, (though young,) as well as her father-in-law; for many a green head, as well as many a hoary head, has been brought by sorrow to the grave; it work-

Seat—backward.] This was probably a stone seat, like those still common at the gates in the east,—sometimes shaded by trees or rendered refreshing by the vicinity of a fountain. Some, thinking, needlessly, that the seat had a back to it, find difficulty in explaining this very plainly told event. Should it be objected, that Eli was old, a judge needing a throne, &c. we may refer to the law of Persia, even, which forbids any but the king alone to have a back to his movable seat. ED.

The presence and ordinances of God were the chief glory of Israel; and the loss of them was the departure of that glory. But if the wife of Phinehas supposed the Lord had finally departed from Israel, she greatly mistook. From Shiloh indeed the ark, the glory of Israel, was finally removed; for probably the inhabitants of that city had too much resembled the abandoned priests; as is generally the case, when such examples of sacerdotal impiety and profligacy are exhibited: but it was restored to Israel, and established in another place. (Ps. 78: 61—64, 67—69. Jer. 7: 12—15.) Neither was the ruin of Eli's family the destruction of the Aaronic priesthood. (2: 35, 36.) SCOTT.

21 And she named the child † I-cha-bod, saying, [p] The glory is departed from Israel: (because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law, and her husband:)

22 And she said, [q] The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken.

CHAP. V.

The Philistines place the ark in the temple of Dagon at Ashdod, 1, 2. Dagon falls down before it, and is broken in pieces, 3—5. The Philistines are smitten with emerods at Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron, when the ark is brought to those cities, 6—12.

AND the Philistines [a] took the ark of God, and brought it from [b] Ebenezer unto [c] Ashdod.

2 When the Philistines took the ark of God, they brought it into the house of [d] Dagon, and set it by Dagon.

3 And when they of Ashdod arose early on the morrow, behold, [e] Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth, before the ark of the LORD. And they took Dagon, and [f] set him in his place again.

4 And when they arose early on the morrow-morning, behold Dagon was fallen upon his face to the ground before the ark of the LORD; and [g] the head of Dagon, and both the palms of his hands, were cut off upon the threshold; only ‡ the stump of Dagon was left to him.

eth death. I. She was of a very tender spirit. The amazing news coming at this unhappy juncture, it put her into labor, as great frights or other strong passions sometimes do. Those who are drawing near to that needful hour, have need to treasure up for themselves comforts from the covenant of grace, to balance, not only the usual sorrows, but any thing extraordinary, that may add to the grief which they do not foresee. Faith, at such a time, will keep from fainting. Ps. 27: 13. She was of a very gracious spirit, v. 22. She said, The glory is departed from Israel; not lamenting so much the sinking of that particular family to which she was related, as the general calamity of Israel in the captivity of the ark. This, this was it, that was her grief, her death. The women that attended her, who, it is likely, were some of the first rank in the city, encouraged her, thinking her concern was mostly about the issue of her pains, but she answered not, neither did she regard it. The sorrows of her travail, had she had no other, would have been forgotten, for joy that a man child was born into the world. But what is that joy, to one that feels herself dying? No joy but that which is spiritual and divine, will stand us in any stead then; death is too serious a thing to admit the relish of an earthly joy, it is all flat and sapless then. What is it to one that is lamenting the loss of the ark? Small comfort could she have of a child born in Israel, in Shiloh, when the ark is gone, and is a prisoner in the land of the Philistines.

II. This made her give her child a name which should perpetuate the remembrance of the calamity, and her sense of it. Where is the glory? Or, Alas for the glory! or, There is no glory; (v. 21.) which she thus explains with her dying lips, (v. 22.) 'The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken. Never let the name of an Israelite, much less a priest, carry glory in it any more, now that the ark is taken.' Note, (1.) The purity and plenty of God's ordinances, and the tokens of his presence in them, are the glory of any people, much more so than their wealth, and trade, and interest among the nations. (2.) Nothing is more cutting, more killing, to a faithful Israelite, than the want and loss of these. If God go, the glory goes, and all good goes. Wo unto us, if He depart!

CHAP. V. V. 1—5. I should have thought the next news would have been, that all Israel, from Dan to Beer-sheba, had gathered together as one man, with a resolution to bring back the ark, or die in the attempt: but we find no motion of that kind, so little zeal or courage was there left. Nay, we do not find that they desired a treaty with the Philistines about the ransom of it, or offered any thing in lieu of it; 'It is gone, and let it go.' If the ark will help itself, it may, for they will not help it. Unworthy they were of the name of Israelites, that could thus tamely part with the glory of Israel. God would therefore take the work into his own hands, and plead his own cause, since men would not appear for Him.

Here is, I. The Philistines' triumph over the ark; they were the more pleased, the more proud, to be masters of it now, because, before the battle, they were possessed with a great fear of it. God restrained them, that they did not offer any violence to it; and whether their curiosity led them to open it, and to read what was written on the two tables of stone in it, we are not told; perhaps they looked no further than the golden outside, and the cherubims that covered it, like children that are more affected with the fine binding of their Bibles, than with the precious matter contained in them. They carried it to Ashdod, one of their five cities, and that in which Dagon's temple was; there they placed it, by Dagon, v. 2. Either, as a sacred thing, they designed to pay some religious respect to, in conjunction with Dagon; for the gods of the heathen were never looked upon as averse to partners: or, rather, as a trophy of victory, in honor of Dagon, to whom, no doubt, they intended to offer a great sacrifice, as when they had taken Samson; (Judg. 16: 23, 24.) boasting, that as then they had triumphed over Israel's champion, so now over Israel's God. What a reproach this to God's great name! But so it is, because God

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

God will rather let his avowed enemies triumph for a season, than encourage hypocrites, whose crimes still more dishonor his holy name.—The most avowed infidels and atheists, and the most atrocious and desperate offenders, have their pangs of conviction and disquietude of mind: with all their efforts, they cannot utterly exclude forebodings of fatal effects from their rebellion against the God of heaven; and though they conceal and quiet this apprehension for a time, and even prosper in their ungodliness; yet their fear will come upon them, and even far worse than they ever foreboded. (Prov. 10: 24.)—When death, in its most formidable shape, finds men humbled for their sins, crying for mercy, and more anxious for the cause of God and truth, than for the most valued earthly comforts, it will eventually prove a blessing; yea, every dispensation is mercy, which rescues the immortal soul from hell. (P. O. Dan. 4: 28—37.)—What miseries do some ungodly men entail on all connected with them! And what an awful lesson is here for parents, who are tempted to connive at the first appearances of vice in their children! Let them reflect on Eli's death, on the far more dreadful condition of his sons, on the dying agonies and sorrows of Phinehas's wife, on the slaughter of Israel, the ark taken captive, 'the glory departed,' and Shiloh forsaken; and let them tremble to think 'how great a matter a little fire kindleth.' (2 Kings 11: 1, 2. 2 Chr. 13: 1. 19: 2. 21: 3, 4.)—'In the midst of life we are in death:' some situations, however, peculiarly remind those who are placed in them to be ready for a sudden call; and few more than pregnancy.—Though the glory may successively be withdrawn from sinful nations, cities, or villages; yet it shall never depart from Israel, but shall shine forth in one place, when it has been eclipsed in another: for Jesus, our High Priest, ever liveth to maintain his own cause, and the gates of hell shall never prevail against his church; whatever may be the triumphing boasts of his enemies, or the desponding fears of his people. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. Besides the other wickedness of Israel, the idolatry of the Danites yet remained unpunished and unrepressed: and this might be one reason why the Lord was pleased to deliver his ark into the hand of these idolaters. (Judg. 18: 30, 31. 20: 8—11, 20—25.) SCOTT.

(1.) Ashdod.] 'Called Azotus by the Greeks, was one of the 5 satrapies of the Philistines, and a place of great strength and consequence. It was situated near the Mediterranean, between Ashkelon and Jamnia, 34 ms. N. Gaza, according to Diod. Sic. and the Antonine and Jerusalem Itineraries. It is now called Shdood; and Dr. Richardson says they neither saw nor heard of any ruins there. "The ground," he observes, "around Ashdod is beautifully undulating, but not half stocked with cattle. The site of the town is on the summit of a grassy hill; and, if we are to believe historians, was anciently as strong as it was beautiful." GREENF.

'Bp. Wilson observes, that in this ch. all the attributes of God are displayed: his justice, in punishing his own people for their sins; his goodness, in thus manifesting Himself to them that knew Him not; his power, in making the idols fall before Him; his truth, in vindicating Himself upon the Israelites for their sins, and the Philistines for their idolatry and false gods.' BOOTHR.

Verse 4.

Head and hands.] 'The former, the seat of wisdom; the latter, the instruments of action.' POOLE.

5 Therefore [h] neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that come into Dagon's house, [i] tread on the threshold of Dagon in Ashdod unto this day.

6 ¶ But [k] the hand of the LORD was heavy upon them of Ashdod, and he destroyed them, and smote them with [l] emerods, even Ashdod, and the coasts thereof.

7 And when the men of Ashdod [m] saw that it was so, they said, [n] The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us: for his hand is sore upon us, and [o] upon Dagon our god.

8 They sent therefore and gathered all the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, [p] What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel? And they answered, Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about unto [q] Gath. And they carried the ark of the God of Israel about thither.

9 And it was so, that after they had carried it about, [r] the hand of the LORD was against the city with a very great destruction: and he smote the men of the city, both small and great, [s] and they had emerods in their secret parts.

10 Therefore they sent the ark of God to [t] Ekron. And it came to pass as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to * us, to slay us and our people.

11 So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to his own place, that it slay † us not, and our people: for there was [u] a deadly destruction throughout all the city; the hand of God was very heavy there.

12 And the men that [x] died not were smitten with the emerods; and will show of how little account the ark of the covenant is, if the covenant itself be broken and neglected: so it is for a time, that God may have so much the more glory, in reckoning with those that thus affront Him, and get Him honor upon them. Having punished Israel that betrayed the ark, by giving it into the hands of the Philistines, He will next deal with those that abused it, and will fetch it out of their hands again. Thus even the wrath of man shall praise Him; and He is bringing about his own glory, even then when He seems to neglect it, Ps. 76: 10.

II. The ark's triumph over Dagon. 1. Once and again, Dagon was made to fall before it. Great care was taken in setting up the images of their gods, to fix them; (the prophet notices it, Isa. 41: 7. 46: 7.) Note, The kingdom of Satan will certainly fall before the kingdom of Christ, error before truth, profaneness before godliness, and corruption before grace, in the hearts of the faithful. When the interests of religion seem to be run down, and ready to sink, yet even then we may be confident the day of their triumph will come. Great is the truth, and it will prevail.

2. The priests that found their idol on the floor, make all haste, before it be known, to set him in his place again. A sorry, silly thing to make a god of, which, when he was down, wanted help to get up again; and sottish wretches those, that could pray for help from that idol that needed, and, in effect, implored, their help. But they are resolved Dagon shall be their god still, and therefore set him up in his place. Bishop Hall observes hence, It is just with God, that those who want grace, shall want wit too; and it is in the power of superstition to turn men into the stocks and stones they worship. They that make them, are like unto them. What is it that the great upholders of the anti-christian kingdom are doing at this day, but heaving Dagon up, and laboring to set him in his place again, and healing the deadly wound that has been given to the beast; but if the reformation be the cause of God, before which it has begun to fall, it shall not prevail, but shall surely fall before it.

3. The next night Dagon fell the second time, v. 4. and, to their great confusion, they find his case now worse than before; the head and hands were cut off from the threshold. So that nothing remained but the stump, or, as the marg. the fishy part of Dagon; for (as many learned men conjecture) the upper part of this image was in a human shape, the lower, in the shape of a fish; as mermaids are painted. An admirable figure, very ridiculous, and worthy to be despised, Dagon made now, when the fall had anatomized him, and showed how the human part and the fishy part were artificially put together, which, perhaps, the ignorant devotees had been made to believe was done by miracle. His losing his head and hands, proved him utterly destitute both of wisdom and power, either to advise or act for them. Gird yourselves, but ye shall be broken to pieces.

4. The threshold of Dagon's temple was ever after looked upon as sacred, and not to be trodden on, v. 5. Some think reference is had to this superstitious usage of Dagon's worshippers, (Zeph. 1: 9.) where God threatens to punish those, who, in imitation of them, leaped over the threshold. One would have thought this should have convinced the Philistines of their folly, in worshipping such a senseless thing, and that henceforward they should have paid their homage to the Conqueror; but, instead of being reformed, they were hardened in their idolatry, and, as evil men and seducers are wont, became worse and worse. Instead of despising Dagon, for the threshold's sake that beheaded him, they are almost ready to worship the threshold, because it was the block on which he was beheaded; shaming those who tread under foot the blood of the covenant, and trample on things truly sacred. Yet this superstition would help perpetuate the remembrance of Dagon's disgrace; for, with the custom, the reason would be transmitted to posterity. Thus God would have honor, even out of their superstition.

V. 6—12. The downfall of Dagon, if the people had made a good use of it, might have prevented the vengeance God here proceeds to take on them for the indignities done to his ark, and their obstinate adherence to their idol, in defiance of the plainest conviction. If they will not see the glory, they shall feel the weight, of God's hand, for so the Philistines did; (v. 6.) and He not only convinced them of their folly, but severely chastised their insolence.

1. He destroyed them, i. e. cut off many by sudden death, those, we may suppose, that had most triumphed in the captivity of the ark. This is distinguished from the disease with which others were smitten. At Gath, it is called a great destruction, (v. 9.) a deadly destruction, v. 11. And it is expressly said, (v. 12.) that those who were smitten with the emerods, were the men that died not by the other destruction, which, probably, was the pestilence. Note, Those that contend with God, his ark, and his Israel, will infallibly be ruined by it at last. If conviction conquer not, destruction shall.

2. Those that were destroyed, He smote with emerods, (v. 6, 9, 12.) Ps. 78: 66. both a painful and shameful disease; a vile disease for vile deserts; by it God would humble their pride, and put contempt on them, as they had on his ark. The disease was epidemical, and, perhaps, among them, a new disease.

3. The men of Ashdod were soon aware it was the hand of God, the God of Israel, v. 7. And thus constrained to acknowledge his power and dominion, and themselves within his jurisdiction, yet they would not renounce Dagon, and submit to Him; but rather, now that He touched their bone and their flesh, they were ready to curse Him, to his face; and, instead of making their peace with Him, and courting the stay of his ark on better terms, they desired to get clear of it, as the Gadarenes, when they had lost their swine, desired Christ to depart out of their coasts. Carnal hearts, when they smart under the judgments of God, would rather, if it were possible, put Him far from them, than enter into covenant and communion with Him, and make Him their friend.

4. 'What,' they say, 'shall we do with the ark?' At last, it was agreed it should be carried to Gath. Some superstitious conceit they had, that the fault was in the place, and the ark would be better pleased with another lodging, further off from Dagon's

CHAP. VI.

At the end of seven months the Philistines consult about sending back the ark, 1—9. They bring it on a new cart, with oblations, to Beth-shemesh, 10—18. The Beth-shemites are smitten for looking into it, 19,20. They send to the men of Kirjath-jearim to fetch it, 21.

AND [a] the ark of the LORD was in the country of the Philistines seven months.

2 And the Philistines [b] called for the priests and the diviners, saying, What shall we do to the ark of the LORD? tell us wherewith we shall send it to his place.

3 And they said, If ye send away the ark of the God of Israel, send it not [c] empty; but in any wise return him [d] a trespass-offering: then ye shall be healed, and it shall be [e] known to you, why his hand is not removed from you.

4 Then said they, What shall be the trespass-offering which we shall return to him? They answered, [f] Five golden emerods, and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines: for one plague was on * you all, and on your lords.

temple; therefore, instead of returning it, as they should have done, to its own place, they contrive to send it to another place. Gath is pitched upon, but the men of that city were smitten, both small and great, (v. 9.) dwarfs and giants; all alike to God's judgments; none so great as to overtop them, none so small as to be overlooked by them.

5. The ark had the tables of the law in it; and nothing more welcome to faithful Israelites than the Word of God; to them it is a savor of life unto life: but to uncircumcised Philistines, that persist in enmity to God, nothing more dreadful or unwelcome; to them it is a savor of death unto death. Note, God can easily make Jerusalem a burdensome stone to all that heave at it. Zech. 12: 3.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—9. The first words of the chapter tell us how long the ark was in captivity in the country or field (so the original) of the Philistines; from which some gather that, having tried it in all their cities, and found it a plague, they at length sent it into the open fields, upon which, mice (v. 5.) sprang up out of the ground in great multitudes, and destroyed the corn which was now nearly ripe, and marred the land. So God let them know, that, wherever they carried the ark, so long as they carried it captive, they should find it a curse to them. But most take it to signify, as we render it, The country of the Philistines. Now, 1. Seven months Israel was punished with the absence of the ark, that special token of God's presence. A melancholy time, no doubt, to the good people, particularly Samuel; but they had this comfort, as we have in like distress, when deprived of public ordinances, that, wherever the ark is, the Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven, and by faith and prayer we may have access with boldness to Him there. 2. Seven months the Philistines were punished with the presence of the ark; so long it was a plague to them, because they would not send it home sooner. Note, Sinners lengthen out their own miseries, by obstinately refusing to part with their sins. Egypt's plagues had been fewer than ten, had not Pharaoh's heart been hardened not to let the people go.

But at length it is determined the ark must be sent back, there is no remedy, they are undone if they detain it.

1. The priests and the diviners are consulted, v. 2. as supposed best acquainted both with the rules of wisdom, and the rites of worship and atonement. And the Israelites being their neighbors, and famed above all people for the institutions of their religion, they had, no doubt, the curiosity to acquaint themselves with their laws and usages; therefore it was proper to ask them, What shall we do to the ark of Jehovah? They give their advice very fully, and seem very unanimous in it. It was a wonder they did not, as friends to their country, give it, officially, before they were asked. It seems they were well acquainted with the Mosaic history, and could cite precedents out of it. This good use we should make of the remaining records of God's judgments on obstinate sinners, we should by them be warned, not to harden our hearts as they did. It is much cheaper learning by other people's experience than by our own.

2. They advise, that they should send a trespass-offering back with it, v. 3. Whatever the gods of other nations were, they knew the God of Israel was a jealous God, and therefore, thought to make this return. Injured justice demands satisfaction; so far natural light instructed men; but when they began to contrive what that satisfaction should be, they became wretchedly vain in their imaginations: we know but one that can take away sin.

3. They direct, that this trespass-offering should be an acknowledgment of the punishment of their iniquity; by which they might take shame to themselves, as conquered and yielding, and guilty before God, and might give glory to the God of Israel, as their mighty Conqueror; and most just Avenger, v. 5. They must make images of the emerods and mice, and so make their reproach perpetual by their own act; (Ps. 78: 66.) owning thereby the almighty power of the God of Israel, who could chastise and humble them, even in the day of their triumph. These images must be made of gold, to intimate that they would gladly purchase their peace with the God of Israel, at any rate; nor think it bought too dear with gold, with much fine gold. The golden emerods must be five, according to the number of the lords, who, it is likely, were all afflicted with them, and were content thus to own it: it was advised, that the golden mice should be five too; but because the whole country was infested with them, it should seem, on second thoughts, they sent more of them, v. 18. Their proposal to offer a trespass-offering, was conformable enough to divine revelation at that time; but to send such things as these for trespass-offerings, was very foreign, and showed them grossly ignorant of the methods of reconciliation appointed by the law of Moses; for there it appears all along, that it is blood, and not gold, that makes atonement for the soul.

4. They encourage them to hope, that thereby they would take an effectual course to get rid of the plague, v. 3. For, it seems, the disease ob-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord may for a season permit his cause to be run down, in order to expose the hypocrisy, to undermine the vain confidence, or to chastise the wickedness, of his professed people: for He knows how, without any human help, and in defiance of all enemies, to recover it from the ruins, and to establish it in greater splendor; and this may account for the successes of infidels and atheists, through so many countries, which have long professed Christianity, but have corrupted and disgraced it. But the short-lived triumphings of the wicked, on such occasions, will terminate in their deeper disgrace, and more dreadful punishment.—Men may be convinced by the judgments of God, that He is a terrible enemy, and that it is in vain to contend with Him; and they may be constrained to render Him a feigned submission: (Ps. 66: 1—3. 81: 14, 15.) but nothing, except his renewing grace, will produce genuine repentance, faith, and love, and conversion from every idol to his worship and service. It is equally dangerous to oppose those partial revivals of true religion, which take place from age to age: for the ark of God will cause every Dagon to fall down before it, till all of them be broken in pieces.—The zeal and pertinacity, with which the grossest idolatries and most stupid superstitions have been supported against the cause of God and truth, display the blindness of fallen man's understanding, as much as the depravity of his affections.—Thus, convinced sinners also, with perverse assiduity, set up again those false confidences and worldly idols, which seemed to be thrown down under the preaching of the Gospel: or when the old delusion will no longer soothe their consciences, they exchange it for another equally absurd, as long as they continue to love sin, and to hate the spiritual service and humbling truth of God. But when Christ, the true Ark of the covenant, really enters the heart of fallen man, (which is indeed Satan's temple,) all idols will fall before his presence and power; every endeavor to set them up again will be in vain; all iniquity will be forsaken; all unrighteous gain restored; and the Lord will claim and possess the throne. Yet pride, self-love, and worldly lusts, though dethroned and crucified, still remain within us. Let us then watch and pray against their prevalency; let us seek to have them more entirely destroyed; and let us consider death, through the mercy of God, and the grace of the Gospel, as attended by the final destruction of our worst enemy, 'the sin that dwelleth in us.' SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. It was far more honorable to the Lord, to constrain the Philistines to send back the ark of their own accord, than that war should wrest it, or money ransom it, out of their hands. (Note, 5: 6—12.) SCOTT.

Verses 2—9.

It has been conjectured, that when the emerods and pestilence exceedingly afflicted the inhabitants of each city, to which the ark was carried, the Philistines placed it in the open field: and that then great numbers of mice began to destroy their crops and spoil the land. They were reluctant to conclude that their afflictions were from God, and framed an artful device for putting it to the trial: In short, they evinced how unwilling they were to yield, and how unable to resist. That cattle unaccustomed to the yoke should draw so even, so orderly, and still go forward; that without any driver, they should go from home, to which all tame creatures have a natural inclination, and from their own calves, to which they had a natural affection; that, without any director, they should go the straight road to Beth-shemesh, a city eight or ten miles off, never miss the way, never go aside into the fields to feed themselves, nor turn back home to feed their calves: they went on lowing for their young ones, by which it appeared that they had not forgotten them, but that nature was sensible of the grievance of going from them; the power of the God of nature therefore appeared so much the greater, in overruling one of the strongest instincts of nature. These two kine, says Lightfoot, knew their Owner, their great Owner, (Isa. 1: 3.) whom Hophni and Phinehas knew not; to which I may add, they brought home the ark, to shame the stupidity of Israel, that made no attempt to fetch it home. God's providence is conversant about the motions even of brute creatures, and serves its own purposes by them. The lords of the Philistines, with a suitable retinue, no doubt, went after them, wondering at the power of the God of Israel; thus they who thought to triumph over the ark, were made to go like menial servants after it.

They were going on with their worldly business, in no care about the ark; made no inquiries what was become of it; but were as careless as the people that ceiled their own houses, and let God's house lie waste. Note, God will, in his own time, deliver his church, though fought against by its enemies, and neglected by its friends. Some observe, that the returning ark found the men of Beth-shemesh not idling or sporting in the streets of the city, but busy, reaping their corn: thus the tidings of the birth of Christ were brought to the shepherds, when they were keeping their flock by night. The devil visits idle men with his temptations; God visits industrious men with his favors. 1. (4.) Golden emerods and mice.] 'It was a very ancient usage, when a plague or other calamity infected a country, for the magicians to form an image of the destroyer, or of things on which the plague particularly rested, in gold, silver, ivory, wax, &c. under certain configurations of the heavens: and to set this up in some proper place, that the evils thus represented might be driven away. These consecrated images were the same that are called talismans or telesms among the Asiatics.' Dr. A. 'Herodotus seems to have had some knowledge of this history; but has assigned another cause. He says, the Scythians having plundered the temple of Askalon, a celebrated city of the Philistines, the goddess who was worshipped there afflicted them with a peculiar disease. The Philistines, perhaps, thus related the story; but it evidently passed for truth, that this disease was ancient, and had been sent by some avenging deity. . . . The heathen frequently offered to their gods [as Roberts asserts they do in India now] figures representing those parts of the body which had been diseased; and such kinds of ex votis are still frequent in Catholic countries; being consecrated in honor of some saint, who is supposed to have wrought the cure: they are images of wax or of metal, exhibiting those parts of the body in which the disease was situated.'

ROBINSON'S CALM.

Respecting this judgment inflicted on the Philistines, JAHN dissents entirely from the common view, that it was dysentery, or hæmorrhoides, see note, ch. 5: 6. and, following Lichtenstein in Eichhorn's Bibliothek, supposes the word rendered mice, v. 5, 11, 18. to mean venomous solpugas, a species of spider, yet so large, and so similar in form to mice, as to admit their being denominated by the same word. 'They destroy,' he says, 'and live upon, scorpions. They also bite men, whenever they can have an opportunity. The probable supposition then is, that solpugas were at this time multiplied among the Philistines, by the special providence of God, and that, being very venomous, they were the means of destroying many individuals.

This last he ascribes to locusts and devouring mice, which had for 4 years together so destroyed the fruits of the earth, as to cause almost a total failure of their crops.' GREENF.

the joy of harvest. Note, The return of the ark, and the revival of holy ordinances, after days of restraint and trouble, cannot but be matter of great joy to every faithful Israelite.

2. They offered up the kine for a burnt-offering, using the wood of the cart for fuel; (v. 14.) which probably, the Philistines intended, when they sent them, should be a part of their trespass-offering, to make atonement, v. 3, 7. However, the men of Beth-shemesh thought it proper to use them, because it was by no means fit they should ever be put to any other use; and, no doubt, they were accepted, though the animals were females, whereas, in strictness, every burnt-offering was to be male.

3. They deposited the ark, with the chest of jewels the Philistines presented, on the great stone in the open field. The intrinsic grandeur of instituted ordinances ought not to be diminished, in our eyes, by the meanness and poverty of the place where they are administered.

4. They offered the sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, some think, on the great stone, more probably, on an altar of earth made for the purpose, v. 15. And the case being extraordinary, the law for offering at the altar in the court of the tabernacle was dispensed with, and the more easily, because Shiloh was now dismantled. Beth-shemesh, though it lay within the lot of the tribe of Dan, yet belonged to Judah, so that this accidental bringing of the ark hither, was an indication of its designed settlement there, in process of time. Ps. 78: 67, 68. It was one of those cities assigned out of the lot of Judah to the sons of Aaron, Josh. 21: 16. Whither should the ark go, but to a priest's city? And it was well they had those of that sacred order ready, (for though they are here called Levites, (v. 15.) yet it should seem they were priests,) both to take down the ark, and to offer the sacrifices.

V. 19—21. Here is, 1. The sin of the men of Beth-shemesh, v. 19. Every Israelite had heard great talk of the ark, and been possessed with a profound veneration for it; but they had been told, it was lodged within a veil, and even the high priest himself might not look upon it but once a year, and then through a cloud of incense. Perhaps, this made many say, (as we are apt to covet what is forbidden,) they would give a great deal for a sight of it. Some of these Beth-shemites, we may suppose, for that reason rejoiced to see the ark, (v. 13.) more than for the sake of the public. Yet this did not content them; they would go further, and take off the covering, and look into it; under pretence of seeing whether the Philistines had not taken the two tables out of it, or some way damaged them; but really to gratify a sinful curiosity of their own, which intruded into things God had thought fit to conceal from them. Note, It is a great affront to God, for vain men to pry into, and meddle with, the secret things which belong not to them, Deut. 29: 29. Col. 2: 18. We were all ruined by an ambition of forbidden knowledge. What made this looking into the ark a great sin, was, it proceeded from a very low and mean opinion of the ark. The familiarity they had with it, on this occasion, bred contempt and irreverence. Perhaps, they presumed on their being priests; but the dignity of the ministerial office will be so far from excusing, that it will aggravate, a careless and irreverent treatment of holy things. They should, by their example, have taught others to keep their distance, and look on the ark with a holy awe. Perhaps, they presumed on the kind entertainment they had given it, and the sacrifices they had now offered to welcome it home with; but let no man think that service done for God will justify him in any instance of disrespect or irreverence toward the things of God. Or, it may be, they presumed on the present mean circumstances the ark was in, newly come out of captivity, and unsettled; now that it stood upon a cold stone, they thought they might make free with it; they should never have such another opportunity of being familiar with it. But it is an offence to God, if we think meanly of his ordinances, because of the mean manner of their administration. Had they looked with an understanding eye on the ark, and not judged purely by outward appearance, they would have thought it never shone with greater majesty than now, when it had triumphed over the Philistines, and come out of its house of bondage (like Christ out of the grave) by its own power; had they considered this, they would not have looked into it thus, as a common chest.

2. Their punishment for this sin; He smote the men of Beth-shemesh, many of them, with a great slaughter. How jealous is God for the honor of his ark! He smote 50,000 and 70 men. This account of their numbers smitten, is expressed in a very unusual manner in the original, which, beside the improbability that so many should be guilty, and so many slain, occasions many learned men to question, whether we take the matter right. In the original it is, He smote in (or among) the people, threescore and ten men; 50,000 men. The Syriac and Arabic read it, 5,070 men; the Chaldee, 70 men of the elders, and 50,000 of the common people. 70 men as valuable as 50,000 so some, because they were priests. Some think the 70 were the Beth-shemites slain for looking into the ark, and the 50,000 those slain by the ark, in the land of the Philistines. He smote 70 men, that is, 50 out of a thousand; which was one in 20, a half decimation; so some understand it. The Septuagint read it much as we do, He smote 70 men, and 50,000 men. Josephus says only 70 were smitten.

3. The terror struck upon the men of Beth-shemesh, by this severe stroke, v. 20. Some think, it bespeaks their murmuring against God, as if He had dealt hardly and unjustly with them. Instead of quarrelling with themselves, and their own sins, they quarrelled with God and his judgments; as David was displeased, in a case not much unlike, 2 Sam. 6: 8, 9. I rather think it bespeaks their awful and reverent adoration of God, as the Lord God, as a holy Lord God, a God before whom none is able to stand. Thus they infer from the tremendous judgment, 'Who is able to stand before the God of the ark?' To stand before God to worship Him, blessed be his name, is not impossible; we are through Christ invited, encouraged, and enabled to do it; but to stand before God, to contend with Him, we are not able.

4. Their desire, hereupon, to be rid of the ark, v. 20. They begin to be as weary of it as the Philistines had been; whereas, if they had treated it with due reverence, who knows, but it might have taken up its residence among them, and they had all been blessed for the ark's sake? But thus, when the Word of God works with terror on sinners' consciences, they, instead of taking the blame and shame to themselves, quarrel with the Word, and put that from them, Jer. 6: 10. Thus do foolish men run from one extreme to the other, from presumptuous boldness to slavish shyness. Kirjath-jearim, i. e. the city of woods, belonging to Judah; (Josh. 15: 9, 60.) it lay in the way from Beth-shemesh to Shiloh; so that when they sent to them to fetch it, we may suppose they in-

The number, [i. e. of the slain] as it stands in our version, is so very large, to be found in one small city, and the expression in the original is so uncommon, that it is generally allowed some mistake is made. The passage may be rendered, 'He smote ... seventy men, looked into the ark of the LORD, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men. And the people lamented, because the LORD had smitten many of the people with a great slaughter.

20 And the men of Beth-shemesh said, [e] Who is able to stand before this holy LORD God? and [f] to whom shall he go up from us?

21 And they sent messengers to the inhabitants of [g] Kirjath-jearim, saying, The Philistines have brought again the ark of the LORD; come ye down, and fetch it up to you.

CHAP. VII.

The ark is removed to Kirjath-jearim, and remains there a long time, 1, 2. At Samuel's exhortation the Israelites repent, and humble themselves before God at Mizpeh, 3—6. The Philistines prepare to assault them: but, while Samuel prays and sacrifices, the Lord discomfits them with thunder before Israel, 7—11. tended that thence the elders of Shiloh should fetch it, but God intended otherwise. Thus was it sent from town to town, and no care taken of it by the public; a sign there was no king in Israel.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—2. 1. We here attend the ark to Kirjath-jearim, to hear no more of it, till David fetched it thence, above 40 years after, (1 Chron. 13: 6.) except once. The Beth-shemites were no better pleased to be rid of it, than they were to receive it. Note, The judgments of God on those who profane his ordinances, should not make us afraid of the ordinances, but of profaning them, and making an ill use of them. But, at Kirjath-jearim,

2. They carefully provided (for the decent entertainment of the ark.) (1.) A proper place to receive it; no public building, but the house of Abinadab, which stood upon the highest ground, and, probably, was the best in their city; or, perhaps, the master of it was the most eminent man they had for piety, and best affected to the ark. None of the men of Beth-shemeth, though a city of priests, received it into his house; but the men of Kirjath-jearim, though common Israelites, gave it house-room, and, no doubt, the best furnished room in the house. Note, God will find a resting place for his ark; if some will not receive it, others will; and even Christ and his apostles preached from house to house, when they could not have public places at command. Sometimes priests are ashamed and outdone in religion by common Israelites. (2.) A proper person to attend it; Eleazar, not the father, because aged and infirm, or pressed with the care of his house and family; but the son, probably a very pious, devout young man, zealously affected toward the best things; his business was to keep the ark, not only from being seized by malicious Philistines, but from being touched or looked into by too curious Israelites. He was to keep the room clean and decent, in which the ark was, that, though an obscure place, it might not look neglected and unlooked after. It does not appear that this Eleazar was of the tribe of Levi, much less of the house of Aaron, nor was it needful he should be, for there was no altar either for sacrifice or incense, only we may suppose some devout Israelites would come and pray before the ark, and those that did so, he was there ready to attend and assist. For this purpose, they sanctified him, i. e. (by his own consent,) obliged him to make this his business, and to give a constant attendance to it; they set him apart for it in the name of all their citizens. This was irregular, but excused by reason of the present distress. When the ark is but newly come out of captivity, we cannot expect it to be, of a sudden, in its usual solemnity, but must take things as they are, and make the best of them.

3. The time of its continuance here in this remote place was long, very long; v. 2. It was very strange, that, all the time Samuel governed, the ark was never brought to its place in the holy of holies, an evidence of the decay of holy zeal among them. God suffered it to be so, to punish them for their neglect of the ark when it was in its place; and to show that the great stress which the institution laid on the ark, was but typical of Christ, and those good things to come, which cannot be moved, Heb. 9: 23.—12: 27. It was a just reproach to the priests, that not one of their order was sanctified to keep the ark.

4. Twenty years of the time were passed, before the house of Israel was sensible of the want of the ark. The Sept. read it, somewhat more clearly than we do; And it was 20 years, and (i. e. when) the whole house of Israel looked up again after the Lord. While it was absent from the tabernacle, the token of God's special presence was wanting, nor could they keep the day of atonement, as it should be kept; but so it was: they were content with the altars without the ark; so easily can formal professors rest satisfied in a round of external performances, without any tokens of God's presence or acceptance. But at length they bethought themselves, and began to lament after the Lord, stirred up to it, probably, by Samuel's preaching, with which an extraordinary working of the Spirit of God set in. A general disposition to repentance and reformation now appears throughout all Israel, and they begin to look unto Him whom they had slighted, and to mourn. Lightfoot thinks this was a matter and time as remarkable as almost any we read of in Scripture; and that that great conversion, Acts 2. and 3. is the only parallel to it. Note, True repentance and conversion begin in lamenting after the Lord; we must be sensible that by sin we have provoked Him to withdraw, and are undone if we continue in a state of distance from Him: and be restless till we have recovered his favor, and obtained his gracious returns. It was better with the Israelites, when they wanted the ark, and were lamenting after it, than when they had the ark, and were prying into it, or priding themselves in it. Better see people longing in the scarcity of the means of grace, than loathing in the abundance of them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those convictions, which spring from terror without humiliation, never produce more than a reluctant and submissive obedience: and the indignant hearts of proud rebels avail themselves of every pretence to ascribe afflictions to chance, rather than to the hand of God, and to infer that it is not absolutely necessary to part with every sin.—If correction be withdrawn, while the heart is thus disposed, the respite proves an encouragement to proceed in transgression: if the affliction be continued after a partial amendment, this is deemed an argument that repentance and reformation are useless. Thus every dispensation of Providence eventually occasions increasing guilt and condemnation.—Faith alone, appropriating the information of the sacred Scriptures, can discover what oblation God will accept, or in what way He will be approached by his sinful creatures. (Mic. 6: 6—8.)—Many appear joyful at the revival of religion, and favorable to its truths and ordinances, who are too busy about the world to be at much trouble or expense about them: and numbers unite in external observances, who have no inward reverence for the Divine Majesty. —The true glory of religion consists in its spiritual excellency: and that simplicity, which the carnal mind despises, forms its highest ornament.—We are not under the same dispensation as Israel was; yet 'our God is still a consuming fire,' and must be 'worshipped with reverence and godly fear.' (Heb. 12: 26—29.) Instead of this reverence, the carnal heart substitutes a slavish fear; and when rebuked for presumption and contempt, or alarmed with discoveries of the justice and holiness of God, it will, with the Gadarenes, or these Beth-shemites, request the Savior to depart, and vainly seek to escape the Lord's displeasure, by an entire forgetfulness of Him. (Matt. 8: 33, 34.) In like manner, numbers, alarmed by the danger of 'eating and drinking unworthily' in the Lord's supper, vainly expect security, by habitual and wilful disobedience to the dying command of Him, whom they still continue to call their Lord and their Savior. (1 Cor. 11: 23—34.) In these ways, many smother up and silence their convictions, and put away salvation from them; and by running into one extreme or another, the very truths and ordinances of God, which are the means of life and salvation to some, become the occasion of deeper condemnation to others. SCOTT.

even fifty out of a thousand men;' which suppose that about 1400 persons were present, and that a twentieth part was slain: and this appears to be the genuine meaning of the passage. The Beth-shemites were not duly humbled for their offence; but they were so terrified, that, like the Philistines, they wanted to have the ark removed from them, and solicited the men of Kirjath-jearim to fetch it; though that was not a city of the priests. NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1, 2. Kirjath-jearim lay in the road between Beth-shemesh and Shiloh. (M. R. a.) It does not appear that Abinadab, and Eleazar his son, were either priests or Levites; though some expositors take it for granted that they were. But it may be questioned, whether an intended neglect of that tribe, for their ungodliness and wickedness, was not shown on this occasion; so that no notice was taken of them in a matter, which otherwise peculiarly and entirely belonged to them.—Here, however, the ark remained, till David removed it in the beginning of his reign over all Israel: (2 Sam. 6: 2, 3.) but it is not agreed how many years intervened, certainly many Eleazar his son to keep the ark of the LORD.

2 And it came to pass while the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim, that the time was long; for it was twenty years: and all the house of Israel [c] lamented after the LORD.

3 And Samuel spake unto all the house of Israel, saying, If ye do [d] return unto the LORD with all your hearts, then [e] put away the strange gods and Ashtaroth from among you, and [f] prepare your hearts unto the LORD, and [g] serve him only; and he will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines.

4 Then the children of Israel did put away [h] Baalim and Ashtaroth, and served the LORD only.

5 And Samuel said, [i] Gather all Israel to [j] Mizpeh, and [k] I will pray for you unto the LORD.

6 And they gathered together to Mizpeh, and [l] drew water, and poured it out before the LORD, and [m] fasted on that day, and said there, [n] We have sinned against the LORD.

And Samuel [o] judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh.

[Practical Observations.]

V. 3—6. We may well wonder where Samuel was, and what he was doing, all this while, for we have not had him so much as named till now, since ch. 4: 1. Not as if he were unconcerned, but his labors are not mentioned, till there appears the fruit of them. When he perceived they began to lament after the Lord, two things he endeavored to do for them.

I. To separate between them and their idols, for there reformation must begin, v. 3. Going, as it should seem, from place to place, (for we find not that they were gathered together till v. 5.) wherever he came, this was his exhortation, 'If you do indeed return to the Lord, as you seem inclined to do, then know,' 1. 'You must renounce and abandon your idols, put away the strange gods, for God will admit no rival; put them away, each one for himself, nay, put them from among you, do what you can, in your places, to rid them out of the country. Put away Baalim, the strange gods, and Ashtaroth the strange goddesses,' Or, Ashtaroth is particularly named, because the best beloved idol. True repentance strikes at the darling sin, and will, with a peculiar zeal and resolution, put away that; the sin which most easily besets us. 2. 'You must make a solemn business of returning to God, and do it with serious consideration and steadfast resolution, for both are included in preparing the heart, directing, disposing, establishing, the heart unto the Lord.' 3. 'You must be entire for God, for Him and no other, serve Him only, else you do not serve Him at all, so as to please Him.' 4. 'This is the only way, and a sure way, to prosperity and deliverance. For it was because you forsook Him, and served other gods, that He delivered you into the Philistines' hands.' This was the purport of Samuel's preaching, and it had a wonderfully good effect, v. 4. Hos. 13: 8. Isa. 30: 22.

II. To engage them for ever to God and his service.

1. He summons all Israel, at least by their elders, as representatives, to meet him at Mizpeh, (v. 5.) and there he promised to pray for them. Note, Ministers should pray for those to whom they preach, that God by his grace would make the preaching effectual. And when we come together in religious assemblies, we must remember, it is as much our business to join in public prayers, as it is to hear a sermon. Ministers would profit their people more, if they did but pray more for them.

2. They obey his summons, and appear well disposed, v. 6. They poured out water before the Lord; signifying, their humiliation and contrition for sin: the Chaldee reads it, They poured out their hearts in repentance before the Lord, their earnest prayers and supplications to God, for mercy: and their universal reformation; they thus expressed their willingness to part with all their sins. Israel is now baptized from their idols: so Lightfoot. And some think it signifies their joy in the hope of God's mercy, which Samuel had assured them of. This ceremony was used with that signification at the feast of tabernacles, John 7: 37, 38. and see Isa. 12: 3. Taking it in this sense, it must be read, They drew water after they had fasted. In the close of their humiliation they thus expressed their hope of pardon and reconciliation. They fasted, abstained from food, afflicted their souls; so expressing repentance, and exciting devotion. They made a public confession, We have sinned; so giving glory to God, and taking shame to themselves. And if we thus confess our sins, we shall find our God faithful and just to forgive us our sins.

3. Samuel judged them at that time in Mizpeh; i. e. he assured them, in God's name, of the par-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. When the stated ministers of God's Word neglect their duty and disgrace their profession, He will render them contemptible in the eyes of the people, (Mal. 2: 8, 9.) and employ others to reform religion, and uphold his worship: for it is better that external institutions should be dispensed with, than that irreligion should be permitted to diffuse its baneful influence. (P. O. 1 Cor. 11: 23—34.)—When the cause of God is deserted in one place, it will be supported in another: and, though the public and regular administration of divine ordinances is highly desirable; yet the same blessing may redound to individuals, when they are unavoidably driven into corners, and confined to private houses.—The Word of God may be faithfully preached, and other proper means used, for a long time, without producing visible or extensive effects: but those who are employed in this important service, should sow the seed in faith and hope, and water it with prayers and tears: they should be 'instant in season and out of season;' persevere without weariness or yielding to despondency, and wait the Lord's time; and their labor will not be in vain. (1 Tim. 4: 11—16.) Nay, perhaps, the seed, which has been long sown and considered as lost, will at length spring up with so large an increase, as to exceed their own most sanguine expectations.—It is a pleasing prospect to the faithful laborer, when he perceives men deeply convinced of their sins, and mourning under the tokens of the Lord's displeasure: and this will also afford him the long desired opportunity, of still more closely and particularly addressing their consciences; that such good impressions may not wear off through procrastination, or produce only a partial or external reformation; but that the people may be prevailed upon, to 'return to the LORD with all their hearts, and to serve Him only;' expecting all their salvation and comfort from Him, and renouncing every false dependence and worldly idol. This blessed frame of mind is the effect of divine grace, but it is our duty; and, in the use of means, we are required to prepare our hearts, and arm our souls with a steadfast determination thus to trust and serve the Lord. (Acts 11: 23, 24. 1 Pet. 4: 1, 2.)—When, in the first place, every one has 'taken heed to himself,' he ought next to employ his best endeavors to engage his family, and his neighbors also, in the service of God: and when those in high stations and public employments unite in using their influence and authority, in a mild, intelligent, and scriptural manner, for these purposes, the most extensive blessings may be expected. more than 20; so that the expression 20 years, clearly refers to the time that passed previously to the events recorded in the rest of this chapter.—Some learned men think that the tabernacle had before this been removed from Shiloh, perhaps to Nob. Verses 5, 6.

(Note, Judg. 20: 1, 2.) The ceremony of 'drawing water, and pouring it out before the LORD,' might be an emblem of the effects of divine grace upon the heart: which disposes it to pour forth itself as water before the Lord, in penitential confessions, with tears of godly sorrow, and in fervent prayers and thanksgiving. (M. R. 1.)—Some think, the water was used in a kind of baptismal ablution or purification; others, that it was an expression of their holy joy in God; and others, that it was intended to purify the ground on which the altar was built.—On this occasion Samuel began publicly to act as judge, or chief magistrate, in settling differences; and perhaps in punishing criminals and obstinate idolaters: though he seems to have previously exercised authority in a more private manner. SCOTT.

(5.) Gather, &c.] It is supposed by Dr. A. Clarke, that this 'was an armed assembly; Samuel,' he remarks, 'knew, an unarmed assembly could not safely be convened in the vicinity of the Philistines.—The assembly was held for religio-politico-military purposes.' ED.

(6.) Poured, &c.] 'Pouring water was a part of the ceremonial of fasting.' DODD. Roberts mentions 'pouring out water' as an ancient Hindoo sacred ceremony, for confirmation of an oath, &c. ED. 'This exhibited the atonement and expiation of their sins, which passed away like water to be remembered no more, as Kinchi; or rather signified that they thoroughly renounced idolatry, that nothing of it should remain; as when water is poured out of a cask there remains no smell, as there does when other liquors are poured out.' CHAP. VIII.

Samuel, when old, makes his sons judges; who behave ill, and give the people an occasion of desiring a king, 1—5. Samuel is displeased, and prays concerning it; but the Lord requires him to comply, and to show them the manner of a king, 6—18. They persist in their request; and Samuel by divine direction yields to them, 19—22.

AND it came to pass, when Samuel was old, that he [a] made his [b] sons judges over Israel.

2 Now the name of his first-born was [c] Joel, and the name of his second Abiah: they were judges in Beer-sheba.

2. In recovering the public rights, v. 14. By his influence, Israel had courage to demand the cities the Philistines had unjustly taken, and long detained; and the Philistines not daring to contend with one that had so great an interest in heaven, tamely yielded, and restored (some think) even Ekron and Gath, two of their capital cities, though afterward they retook them; others think, some small towns between Ekron and Gath, which were forced from the Philistines. It is added, There was peace between Israel and the Amorites, i. e. the Canaanites, the remains of the natives. Not that Israel made any league with them, but they were quiet; and not so mischievous as sometimes. Thus, when a man's ways please the Lord, He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him.

3. In administering public justice, v. 15, 16. He judged Israel: as a prophet, he taught them duty, and reproved their sins, called judging, Ezek. 20: 4.—22: 2. Moses judged Israel, when he made them know the statutes of God, and his laws; (Ex. 18: 16.) and thus Samuel judged them to the last, even after Saul was made king; so he promised them then, when Saul was inaugurated, ch. 12: 23. I will not cease to teach you the good and right way. As a magistrate, he received appeals from the inferior courts, and gave judgment; tried causes, and determined them, prisoners, and acquitted or condemned them, according to the law. When in his prime, he rode the circuit, kept courts at Beth-el, Gilgal, and Mizpeh, all in the tribe of Benjamin; but his constant residence was at Ramah, his father's city, and there he judged Israel, whither they resorted for justice from all parts, v. 17.

4. In keeping up the public exercises of religion; for at Ramah he built an altar to the Lord, not in contempt of that at Nob, or Gibeon, or wherever the tabernacle was; but divine justice having laid Shiloh waste, and no other place being yet chosen for them to bring their offerings to, (Deut. 12: 11.) he looked upon the law which confined them to one place, to be for the present suspended, and therefore, being a prophet, and under divine direction, he did as the patriarchs did, built an altar where he lived, both for the use of his own family, and for the good of the country that resorted to it. Great men should use their wealth, power, and interest, to keep up religion in the places where they live.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. Two sad things, but not strange, we find here.

1. A good and useful man growing old and unfit for service, v. 1. Samuel is reckoned to have been now about 60, not over, and perhaps not so much; but he was a man betimes; and the fruits that are first ripe, keep the worst. He had spent his strength and spirits in the fatigue of public business, and now finds himself old and infirm. Persons in the prime of life, ought to be busy in the work of life; for as they go into years, they will find themselves less disposed to it, and less able for it.

2. The children of a good man going to naught, and not treading in his steps. Samuel had given his sons so good an education, and they had given him such good hopes, and gained such a reputation, that he made them judges, assistants awhile, and afterward deputies at Beer-sheba, remote from Ramah, v. 2. probably in accommodation to the southern districts: we have reason to think Samuel commissioned his sons, not because they were his, (he had no ambition to entail the government on his family, any more than Gideon had,) but because, for aught that yet appeared, they were men very fit for the trust; and none so proper to ease the aged judge, as (other things being equal) his own sons, who, no doubt, were respected for their good father's sake, and, having such an advantage at setting out, might soon have been great, had they been but good. But, alas! their character was the reverse of his, (v. 3.) and their relation to so good a man, which otherwise had been their honor, was really their disgrace. A good extraction is a reproach to him that degenerates from it. Note, Many that have begun well, and promised fair, so that their parents and friends have had great hopes of them, yet afterward have been the grief of those of whom they should have been the joy. When Samuel's sons were settled at a distance from him, then they discovered them-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7—17. The more men know of God and of themselves, the more earnestly will they desire and value the prayers of every Christian, especially of those who are most eminent for faith and holiness, and particularly in seasons of temporal or spiritual distress.—When we are employed in earnest devotion, Satan and his agents may be especially excited to assault us, as both hating our holy engagements, and envying our felicity: but they can do us no harm, unless they can affright us from our duty. Nor can any hostile preparations prevail against that nation, which, in a spirit of true repentance and reformation, and the fervent prayer of faith, has intrusted itself to the Lord's protection.—Through successive generations, the church of God has had occasion to set up EBENEZERS for renewed deliverances: for neither outward persecutions, nor internal corruptions have yet prevailed against her; because 'hitherto the LORD hath helped her;' and He will help her even unto the end of the world.—Every believer should review the records of this preservation, and these deliverances, with admiring gratitude and joyful love; and then, looking back on his own experience, he will find an abridgment of the same history. (2 Cor. 1: 8—11.)—At stated seasons, as at the conclusion of the year, when about to approach the Lord's table, or when we have received some remarkable mercy, we shall find it peculiarly useful thus to review our ways, and to wait upon the Lord to renew our strength: and in so doing we may hope ere long to set up our last Eben-ezer in the realms above, and to begin our eternal songs of joyful praise to Him, who hath helped us quite through, and made us more than conquerors. Verse 17.

It is very remarkable, that in this great revival of religion, the ark was neither removed to Shiloh, nor placed with the tabernacle in any other situation.—It is uncertain whether or not the sanctuary-service was carried on at Shiloh, or Nob, or elsewhere, during all this period, but probably it was either neglected, or very improperly conducted. As the ark, the glory even of the tabernacle, was departed, the more pious Israelites seem to have disregarded it; and to have preferred joining with Samuel in the sacrifices and worship, which, doubtless by divine direction, he performed near his own house. This disregard to the Levitical institutions clearly intimated, that the typical meaning formed their chief use; and, when this was overlooked, they became a lifeless carcass, by no means to be compared with repentance, faith, and love to God and man. (9: 12—14. 2 Kings 3: 20. Ps. 50: 7—15.) SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—5. As we do not find that either God or the people censured Samuel, for 'making his sons judges;' we may infer, that he had properly educated them, and that they appeared well qualified for the office, and were appointed to it for the good and by the approbation of the people. (M. R.—Ex. 23: 6—9. Prov. 17: 8, 23. Am. 5: 10—15. Mic. 3: 8—12. 7: 1—4.)—It is probable, the people in general, and especially the superior persons, were grown weary of being ruled by pious judges and prophets, raised up by God

3 And [d] his sons walked not in his ways, [e] but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment.

4 Then all [f] the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel unto Ramah,

5 And said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now [g] make us a king to judge us like all the nations.

6 But the thing * displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel [h] prayed unto the LORD.

7 And the LORD said unto Samuel, [i] Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for [k] they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them.

8 According [l] to all the works which they have done, since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods; so do they also unto thee.

9 Now therefore, † hearken unto their voice; ‡ howbeit, yet protest solemnly unto them, and show them [m] the manner of the king that shall reign over them.

10 ¶ And Samuel told all the words of the LORD unto the people, that asked of him a king.

11 And he said, [n] This will be the manner of the king that shall reign over you: [o] He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen; and some [p] shall run before his chariots.

12 And he will [q] appoint him captains over thousands, and captains over fifties, [r] and will set them to ear his ground, and to reap his harvest, and to make his instruments of war, and instruments of his chariots.

13 And he will take your daughters to be confectionaries, and to be cooks, and to be bakers.

14 And he will [s] take your fields, and your vineyards, and your olive-yards, even the best of them, and [t] give them to his servants.

selves. Thus, many that have conducted well while under their parents' eye, when they have gone abroad into the world, and set up for themselves, have proved bad. Let none therefore be secure, either of themselves or theirs, but depend on divine grace. Many that have done well in a state of meanness and subjection, have been spoiled by preferment and power. Honors change men's minds, and, too often, for the worse. Samuel's sons were not so profane and vicious as Eli's; but, whatever they were in other respects, they were corrupt judges, they turned aside after lucre, after the mammon of unrighteousness, so the Chaldee. Note, The love of money is the root of all evil; pernicious in any, but especially in judges.

V. 4—22 Perhaps a kingly government had been often talked of among them by persons given to change, and that affected what looked great: but we do not find it was ever till now publicly proposed and debated. Abimelech was little better than a titular king, though he is said to reign over Israel; (Judg. 9: 22.) and perhaps his fall had rendered the title of king odious hitherto, as that of Tarquin did among the Romans.

Here is, I. The elders' address to Samuel, v. 4, 5. Not in a riotous, tumultuous manner, but with due respect they came to his house at Ramah with their address, containing,

1. A remonstrance of their grievances; a small thing will serve factious spirits for a color to desire a change. Thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways. True, Samuel was old, but he had grown old in their service, was the more wise and experienced for his age, and on that account the fitter to rule. And it was very unkind, ungrateful, nay, unjust, to cast him off when he was old. God had saved his youth from being despicable, (ch. 3: 20.) yet they make his old age so, which should have been counted worthy of double honor. If old people be upbraided with their infirmities, and laid aside for them, let them not think it strange. True, his sons did not walk in his ways; the more was his grief, but they could not say it was his fault; he had not, like Eli, indulged them in their badness, but was ready to receive complaints against them. And if that had been the thing desired, we may well suppose, on the making out of the charge of bribery against them, he would have superseded their commissions and punished them. But this would not content the elders, they had another project in view.

2. A petition for the redress of these grievances, by setting a king over them: Make us a king to judge us like all the nations. Thus far was well, that they did not rise in rebellion against Samuel and set up a king for themselves by force; but applied to Samuel, God's prophet, and humbly begged him to do it. But it appears by what follows, it was a bad motion, ill made, and displeasing to God. God designed them a king, a man after his own heart, when Samuel was dead; but they would anticipate God's counsel, and have one now. They had a prophet to judge them, that had immediate correspondence with Heaven, and therein they were great and happy above any nation, none having God so nigh unto them. Deut. 4: 7. But this would not serve, they must have a king to judge them with external pomp and power, like all the nations. They knew it was in vain to court Samuel to take upon him the title and dignity of a king, but he must appoint them one. They do not say, 'Give us a king that is wise and good, and will judge better than thy sons do,' but, 'Give us a king,' any body that will but make a figure. Thus foolishly did they forsake their own mercies, and, under pretence of advancing the dignity of their nation to that of their neighbors, did really thrust themselves down from their own excellency, and profane their crown by casting it to the ground.

II. Samuel's resentment of this address, v. 6. Let us see how he took it: 1. It cut him to the heart. Probably, it was a surprise to him, which made it the more grievous. When they upbraided him with his own infirmities, and his children's irregularities, he could patiently bear it, but it displeased him when they said, Give us a king to judge us, because that reflected on God and his honor. 2. It drove him to his knees; so making himself easy. When any thing disturbs us, it is our interest, as well as our duty, to show God our trouble, Phil. 4: 6. and He gives us leave to be humbly free with Him.

III. God's instruction. They that in straits seek to God, shall find Him nigh, and ready to direct them. He tells him,

1. What would be an allay to his displeasure. (1.) He must not think it hard, they had slighted him, for they had herein slighted God Himself, v. 7. Note, If God interest Himself in the indignities done us, and the contempts put on us, we may well afford to bear them patiently; nor need

Under the government of Moses, Joshua, and the Judges, the people had been exempt from oppression, nay, as far as can be learned by the history, even from taxes of all kinds: (12: 2—7. Num. 16: 15. 31: 47.) but kingly government, like that of the nations, could not possibly be thus supported. (M. R.) And as these [burdensome exactions and cruel oppressions] are the natural effects of absolute authority intrusted with a fallen creature, prone to selfishness and folly; we ought consequently to prefer those limitations and restrictions, which are equally beneficial to the governors and the governed. SCOTT.

we think the worse of ourselves, if for his sake we bear reproach, (Ps. 69: 7.) but rather rejoice, and count it an honor, Col. 1: 24. God reigns over the heathen, over all the world, but the government of Israel had hitherto been, in a more peculiar manner than ever any government was, a Theocracy, a divine government. As the constitution, so the administration, of their government, was by, Thus saith the Lord; this method they were weary of, though it was their honor and safety, above any thing, so long as they kept in with God; they were indeed so much the more exposed to calamities, if they provoked God to anger by sin, and they could not transgress at so cheap a rate as other nations could, which, perhaps, was the true reason why they desired to stand on the same terms with God that other nations did. (2.) He must not think it strange, for they do as they always have done, v. 8.

2. He tells him an answer to their demand. They shall have a king. Hearken to the voice of the people, v. 7, 9. Not that God was pleased with their request, but as sometimes He crosses us, in love, so at other times He gratifies us, in wrath; He did so here. See Hos. 13: 10, 11. Ps. 106: 15.—78: 29. God knows how to bring glory to Himself, and serve his own wise purposes, even by their foolish counsels.

But he must tell them, at the same time, they will soon have enough of a king, and will, when too late, repent their choice. This he must protest solemnly to them; v. 9. Note, Those that set their hearts inordinately upon any thing in this world, to moderate their desires, ought to consider the inconveniences, as well as conveniences, that will attend it. Those that submit to the government of the world and the flesh, are told plainly, what hard masters they are, and what a tyranny the dominion of sin is; yet they will exchange God's government for it.

IV. Samuel's faithful delivery of God's mind to them, v. 10. He told them all the words of the Lord, how ill He resented it; that He construed it into a rejecting of Him, and compared it with their serving other gods; and that if they had any reason left them, and would allow themselves to consult their own interest, they would withdraw their petition, and beg to continue as they were He lays before them, very particularly, what would be the manner of the king that should reign over them, according to the pattern of the nations, v. 11. He does not speak (so Patrick) of a just and honest right of a king to do these things, this is quite otherwise described in Moses' law concerning the king's duty, but such a right as the kings of the nations had then arrogated.

If they will have such a king as the nations have, let them consider,

(1.) He must have a great retinue, abundance of servants, grooms, chariots, horses, gentlemen, and footmen. This is the chief grandeur of princes, and the imaginary glory of great men, to have a multitude of attendants. And whom take but your sons, v. 11. They that used to work for their parents and themselves, must work for him, ear his ground, and reap his harvest, (v. 12.) and count it their preferment too, v. 16. This would be a great change.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No instructions or examples can overcome the bias of our fallen nature to evil; and the Lord communicates his sanctifying grace by wise and righteous rules, of which He does not deign to inform us: duty is our part, and consequences must be left with Him.—External restraints may produce appearances which impose on the most discerning; yet when they are withdrawn, and temptations occur, the evil heart will discover itself; and prosperity has a natural tendency to increase bad propensities. Parents should therefore prepare to bear with resignation disappointments in their children; and not be anxious to prefer or enrich them, lest they should assist in inflaming their passions.—'The love of money is the root of all evil,' and peculiarly odious and mischievous in magistrates and ministers. (Note, 1 Tim. 6: 6—10. P. O. 6—12.)—Grace subdues and mortifies, and convictions restrain, human depravity; but in itself it is the same from generation to generation. Discontent, fondness of change, a desire of conformity to the world, and of outward splendor, are natural to man, and follow him from the cradle to the grave, unless regenerated and new created by the Holy Spirit. No change of circumstances can cure these diseases; and neither the counsels of wise men, nor the testimony of God, will suppress these inordinate desires. When the mind is thus disposed, the slightest circumstance serves as a pretext for rushing upon gratification, yet a pious man would grieve to give others by his conduct even an occasion of sin.—When our grief or displeasure leads us to more fervent prayer and intercession in behalf of those who grieve us, nothing can injure or even long distress us; for the consolation of God will richly repay the injuries of men.—Under the troubles which Providence has allotted us, we may expect the supports of grace: but if we resolutely persist in choosing for ourselves; when we have exchanged slight inconveniences for real grievances, we shall have the aggravation of an accusing conscience, and the divine rebuke. And this will often be the case; for those things which at a distance look pleasant, are generally most bitter when in actual possession.—The law of God, and the manner of men, are widely different; the former should be the rule of our conduct in the several relations of life; the latter the measure of our expectations from others.—As magistracy is the appointment of God, and a great blessing, and as every form is liable to abuses; it is our wisdom to be thankful for the advantages, and patient under the inconveniences, of that government under which we live: and it is our duty to pray continually for our rulers, that they may govern us in the fear of God, and that we may live in all godliness and honesty; thus 'honoring God and the king, and not meddling with them that are given to change,' or disposed, upon every imaginary grievance, or indeed on any account, to speak evil of the ruler of the people. (Rom. 13: 1—6. Tit. 3: 1, 2. 1 Pet. 2: 13—17. 2 Pet. 2: 10, 11.)—But the Lord's servants should behave so unexceptionably, that even those who injure them may not be able to impeach their integrity, or to withhold from them respect and confidence. And it is a hopeful symptom, even in the evidently distempered state of individuals, or collective bodies, when their desires of worldly objects can brook delay; and they can refer the time and manner of their being granted to the determination of Providence. Verses 19—22.

They did not perceive that it was their peculiar privilege to be unlike other nations, especially in this respect. (Note, Num. 23: 9. Rom. 12: 2.)—Amidst the sin and folly of this conduct, it should however be noted to their commendation, that they showed great respect to Samuel. They did not attempt to set up a king of their own choosing, but sought his counsel and concurrence: and on an intimation from him, that their request would be granted, they put such entire confidence in him, that they departed quietly to their own houses. The history of the world cannot produce another instance, in which a public determination was formed to appoint a king; and yet no one proposed either himself or any other person to be king, but referred the determination entirely to God. (Note, Deut. 17: 15.) Ambition of royal authority certainly was not the motive, in the leading men who supported this measure. The whole of their proceedings, even in this highly improper determination, showed, how fully they were convinced, that the law of Moses was from God; and that, even in appointing a king, his directions must be observed; or rather, that the decision must be referred implicitly to God Himself. SCOTT.

The ancestry and personal qualifications of Saul, 1, 2. He is sent to seek his father's asses; but not finding them, he, by the counsel of his servant, purposes going to Samuel, 3—10. He is directed by young maidens where to find him, 11—14. Samuel, prepared by a revelation from God, expects him, and entertains him with great respect, 15—24. On the morrow he privately discourses with him, and brings him on his way, 25—27.

(2.) 'He must keep a great table; he will not be content to dine with his neighbors on a sacrifice, as Samuel used to do, (ch. 9: 13.) but he must have variety of dainty dishes, forced-meats, and sweet-meats, and delicate sauces; and who must prepare these but your daughters, the most ingenious and handy of them, whom you hoped to prefer to houses and tables of their own?'

(3.) 'He must needs have a standing army, for guards and garrisons; (v. 12.) and your sons, instead of being elders of your cities, and living in quiet and honor at home, must be disposed of here at the pleasure of the sovereign.'

(4.) 'You may expect he will have great favorites, servants to be your masters, whom, having dignified and ennobled, he must enrich, and give estates suitable to their honor; and which way can he do that, but out of your inheritances? v. 14, and how will you like that?'

(5.) 'He must have great revenues to maintain his grandeur and power with; and whence must he have them but from you? v. 15, 17. You think the tenths, the double tenths, which God has appointed to support the church, grievous enough, and grudge the payment of them; but, if you have a king, another tenth will be levied with more rigor, to support the royal dignity. Consider the expense with the magnificence, and whether it will quit cost.'

These would be their grievances; and, while they would have none but God to complain to, when they complained to Him, He would not hear them; (v. 18.) nor could they expect that He should. Note, when we bring ourselves into distress by our own irregular desires and projects, we justly forfeit the comfort of prayer, and the benefit of divine aids; and, if God be not better to us than we deserve, we must have our relief in our own hands, and then it is bad with us.

V. The people's obstinacy in their demand, v. 19, 20. One would think, such a representation of the consequences as this, coming from God Himself, who can neither deceive, nor be deceived, should have prevailed with them to waive their request: but their hearts were upon it, right or wrong, good or evil. See the absurdity of inordinate desires, and how they rob men of their reason. They could not stay God's time. God had intimated in the law, that, in due time, Israel should have a king, (Deut. 17: 14, 15.) and, perhaps, they had some intimation the time was at hand; but they are all in haste. 'We, in our day, will have this king over us.' Could they but have waited ten or twelve years, they had had David, a king of God's giving in mercy, and all the calamities attending the setting up of Saul had been prevented. Sudden resolves and hasty desires make work for long and leisurely repentance. What they aimed at, was, not only as before, that they might be like the nations, level with them, above whom God had so far advanced them; but that they might have one to judge them, and to go out before them when they took the field, and to fight their battles. Foolish people, and unwise! Could they ever desire a battle better fought for them than the last was, by Samuel's prayer, and God's thunder? ch. 7: 10. So sick, it seems, were they of their privileges, and what was the issue? Their first king was slain in battle, which none of their judges ever were; so was Josiah, one of the last and best.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—2. Samuel had promised Israel, from God, that they should have a king; it is strange the next news is not of candidates setting up for the government. Why does not the prince of the tribe of Judah look about him now, remembering Jacob's entail of the sceptre on that tribe? Is there never a bold, aspiring man in Israel, to say, 'I will be king, if God will choose me?' No, none appears; whether it is owing to a culpable mean spiritedness, or a laudable humility, I know not; but sure it is what can scarcely be paralleled in the history of any kingdom; a crown, such a crown, set up, and nobody bids for it. Most governments began in the ambition of the prince to rule, but Israel's in the ambition of the people to be ruled. Had any of those elders which petitioned for a king, afterward petitioned to be a king, I should have suspected that person's ambition to have been at the bottom of the motion; but now, (let them have the praise of what was good in them,) it was not so, God having in the law undertaken to choose their king. (Deut. 17: 15.) they all sit still, till they hear from heaven, as in this ch. which begins the story of Saul, their first king, and, by strange steps of Providence, brings him to Samuel to be anointed privately, and so to be prepared for an election by lot, and a public commendation to the people; which follows in the next. And these beginnings had been very hopeful and promising, had it not been that the sin of the people was the spring of this great affair.

We are here told, 1. What a good family Saul was of, v. 1. He was of the tribe of Benjamin; so was the New Testament Saul, who also was called Paul, and he mentions it as his honor, for Benjamin was a favorite, Rom. 11: 1. Phil. 3: 5. That tribe had been reduced to a very small number by the fatal war with Gibeah, and is here called, with good reason, the smallest of the tribes of Israel; v. 21. His father was Kish, a mighty man of power, or, as the margin reads it, in substance; in spirit stout, in body strong, in estate wealthy. The whole lot of the tribe of Benjamin coming to be distributed among 600 men, we may suppose their inheritances were much larger than theirs who were of other tribes; an advantage which somewhat helped to balance the disadvantage of the smallness of their number.

2. What a good figure Saul made, v. 2. No mention is here made of any of the accomplishments of his mind, but only of his body, that he was a tall, proper, a good shape, and a good presence, graceful and well proportioned. When God chose a king after his own heart, he pitched upon one not at all remarkable for the height of his stature, or any thing in his countenance, but its innocency and sweetness, ch. 16: 7, 12. But when He chose a king after the people's heart, who aimed at nothing so much as stateliness and grandeur, He pitched upon this huge tall man, who, if he had no other good qualities, yet would look great. They would have a king like the nations, and the nations commonly chose portly men for their kings.

V. 3—10. Here is, I. A great man rising from small beginnings. Most that are advanced, rise gradually; but Saul, from the level with his neighbors, stepped at once into the throne; according to that of Hannah, He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes. Saul, it should seem, was married, and had children grown up, yet lived in his father's house, and was subject to him. Promotion comes not by chance or human probabilities, but God is the Judge.

II. A great event rising from small occurrences. How low the history begins! as low as any we meet with of those called to preferment.

1. Saul's father sends him with one of his servants, to seek some asses he had lost. It may be,

6 And he said unto him, Behold now, there is in this [k] city a man of God, and he is [l] an honorable man; [m] all that he saith, cometh surely to pass: now, let us go thither; peradventure he can show us our way that we should go.

7 Then said Saul to his servant, But, behold, if we go, [n] what shall we bring the man? for the bread is [*] spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God: what [†] have we?

8 And the servant answered Saul again, and said, Behold, [‡] I have here at hand the fourth part of a shekel of silver; that will I give to the man of God, to tell us our way.

9 (Before-time in Israel, when a man went to [o] inquire of God, thus he spake, Come, and let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was before-time called [p] a Seer.)

10 Then said Saul to his servant, § Well said; come, let us go: so they went unto the city where the man of God was.

11 ¶ And as they went up [‖] the hill to the city, they [q] found young maidens going out to draw water, and said unto them, Is the seer here?

12 And they answered them, and said, He is; behold he is before you: make haste now, for he came to-day to the city; for there is a ¶ sacrifice of the people to-day in [r] the high place.

13 As soon as ye be come into the city, ye shall straightway find him, before he go up to the high place to eat: for the people will not eat until he come, because [s] he doth bless the sacrifice; and afterwards they eat that be bidden. Now therefore get you up; for about [] this time ye shall find him.

14 And they went up into the city: and when they were come into the city, behold, Samuel came out against them, for to go up to the high place.

15 Now [t] the LORD had [††] told Samuel in his ear a day before Saul came, saying, they had no way then to give public notice of strayed or stolen property. A very good law they had to oblige men to bring back an ox or an ass that went astray, but it is to be feared that was, as other good laws, neglected and forgotten. It is easy to observe here, that they who have, must expect to lose; that it is wisdom to look after what is lost; that no man should think it below him to know the state of his flocks; that children should be forward to serve their parent's interests; though Saul's taking care of the asses is to be ascribed, not so much to the humility of his spirit, as to the plainness and simplicity of those times. But his obedience to his father in it, was very commendable. The servant of Kish would be faithful only as a servant, but Saul as a son, in his own business, therefore he was sent too. Saul missed what he sought, but had no reason to complain, for he met with the kingdom, which he never dreamed of.

2. When he could not find them, he determined to return to his father, in consideration of his father's tender concern for him; v. 5. Children should take care to do nothing to grieve or alarm their parents, but be tender of their tenderness.

3. His servant moved, (for it should seem he had more religion than his master,) that since they were now at Ramah, they should call on Samuel, and take his advice. Wherever we are, we should improve our opportunities of acquainting ourselves with those that are wise and good. But there are many that will consult a man of God, if he comes in their way, that would not go a step out of their way to get wisdom.

The servant spoke very respectfully of Samuel, though he knew him, by common fame only, v. 6. Men of God are honorable men, and should be so in our eyes. Acquaintance with the things of God, and serviceableness to the kingdom of God, put true honor on men, and make them great. Samuel's honor, as a man of God, was, that all he saith, cometh surely to pass. This was observed of him, when young, (ch. 3: 19.) and still held true.

They would be advised, whether to return home, or, if there was yet any hope of finding the asses, which way to go next; a poor business to employ a prophet about! Had they said, 'Let us give up the asses for lost, and now that we are so near the man of God, let us go and learn from him the good knowledge of God, since we may not have such another opportunity, the proposal had been such as became Israelites; but, to make prophecy, that glory of Israel, serve so mean a turn as this, discovered too much what manner of spirit they were of. Note, Most people would rather be told their fortune, than their duty; how to be rich, than how to be saved. If it were the business of the men of God to direct for the recovery of lost asses, they would be consulted much more than they are, now that it is their business to direct for the recovery of lost souls; so preposterous is the care of most men.

Saul was thoughtful, what present they should bring the man of God, what fee they should give him for his advice, v. 7. The servant bethought himself, that he had the fourth part of a shekel, about sevenpence half-penny in value, and that he would give, v. 8. 'That will do,' says Saul, let us go, v. 10. Some think when Saul talked of giving Samuel a fee, he measured him by himself, or by his sons, as if he must be hired to do an honest Israelite a kindness, and were like the false prophets, that divined for money. But it rather seems to be agreeable to the general usage of these times, as it is to natural equity, that those who sowed spiritual things, should reap not only eternal things, from Him that employs them, but temporal things, from those for whom they are employed. When the servant generously offered to be at the charge, Saul says, 'Let us go.' Most people love a cheap religion, and like it best, when they can devolve the expense of it on others.

The historian here notices the name then given the prophets, Seers, or seeing men; (v. 9.) not but that the name prophet was then used, and applied to such persons, but that of seers was more in use.

V. 11—17. Gibeah of Saul was not 20 miles from Ramah where Samuel dwelt, and was near to Mizpeh where he often judged Israel; and yet, it seems, Saul had lived so very privately, and taken so little notice of public affairs, that he had never seen Samuel, v. 18. Yet I do not think it any commendation to Saul, that he was a stranger to Samuel. The maid-servants knew him, and

V. 9. was evidently inserted in after ages, perhaps by Ezra, supposed to have set forth a correct edition of the Scriptures then extant, under the superintendence of the Spirit of prophecy. The word prophet had been used of Abraham: (Gen. 20: 7.) but in Samuel's time, in common conversation, Seer was more used: for men of God were also called prophets. (3: 20.) At length, the name Seer sunk into disuse. SCOTT.

(Note, 7: 17.) Shiloh, which God first chose, to place his name there, had forfeited that distinction: no other place was appointed; the tabernacle, wherever at this time situated, did not contain the ark; and at Kirjath-jearim, where the ark remained, was no tabernacle or altar. (Note, 7: 1, 2.)

These circumstances occasioned a kind of temporary suspension of the law: (Lev. 17: 3—7. Deut. 12: 5—7.) and the cities of the priests and Levites, where the people resorted for instruction, seemed the most proper. The highest parts of these cities were generally selected for sacrifice: and from this circumstance, the subsequent pertinacious attachment of the Israelites to 'high places' seems to have been derived. 16 To-morrow about this time I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin, and [u] thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hand of the Philistines: for I have [x] looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me.

17 And when Samuel saw Saul, the LORD said unto him, [y] Behold the man whom I spake to thee of: this same shall * reign over my people.

18 Then Saul drew near to Samuel in the gate, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is.

19 And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer; go up before me unto the high place; for ye shall eat with me to-day, and to-morrow I will let thee go, [z] and will tell thee all that is in thine heart.

20 And as for thine asses that were lost [†] three days ago, [a] set not thy mind on them, for they are found. And [b] on whom is all the desire of Israel? is it not on thee, and on all thy father's house?

21 And Saul answered and said, Am not I [c] a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel? and [d] my family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin? wherefore then speakest thou [‡] so to me?

22 And Samuel took Saul [1] and his servant, and brought them into the parlor, and made them sit [e] in the chiefest place among them that were bidden, which were about thirty persons.

were very particular in their directions, v. 12, 13. We should always be ready to assist inquirers after God's prophets, and further them in their inquiries. Bp. Hall observes, of their knowledge of all these particulars, That, 'where there is practice and example of piety in the better sort, there will be a reflection of it on the meanest. It is no small advantage to live in religious places; for we shall be much to blame if all goodness fall beside us.' When the sacrifice was offered, Samuel blessed it; i. e. prayed over it, and offered up spiritual sacrifices with it. Let the soul first be served.

Saul very opportunely met Samuel, v. 14. This seemed purely accidental, but the wise God serves very great and certain purposes, by very small and casual occurrences. A sparrow falls not to the ground without our Father.

Samuel is informed concerning Saul, by an extraordinary revelation. He told him a secret whisper to his mind; or, perhaps, a still small voice to his ear, probably, when praying in secret for direction in that and other affairs of the nation. Perhaps, it was in expectation of it, that he appointed the feast and the sacrifice, to implore God's blessing on this great and important affair, though he might keep the particular occasion in his own breast. The Heb. is, He uncovereth the ear; to which some allude, to explain the way of God's revealing Himself to us; He not only speaks, but uncovers our ear. We have naturally a covering on our ears, so that we perceive not what God says; (Job. 33: 14.) but when God will manifest Himself to a soul, He uncovers the ear, says, Ephphatha, Be opened; He takes the veil from off the heart.

Saul being a man of unusual stature, it is natural to think Samuel fixed his eyes on him at a distance, and perhaps, looked the more wistfully toward him, because the hour was now come; that he might be fully satisfied, God told him expressly, That is the man that shall restrain in (for magistrates are heirs of restraint) my people Israel.

V. 18—27. Providence having at length brought Samuel and Saul together, we have here an account of what passed between them in the gate, at the feast, and in private. Samuel appeared, in all respects, so much a common person, that Saul, though told he should meet him, never suspected it was he. Thus is great worth oftentimes hid under a very despicable appearance.

Saul had nothing in his mind but to find his asses; but Samuel would take him off from that, and dispose him to the exercises of piety. He satisfies him about his asses, v. 20. and by this, Saul might perceive he was a prophet, that he could answer the inquiry he had not yet made; and thence he might infer, If a man of God can do this, much more doth God Himself understand our thoughts afar off. He surprises him with an intimation of preferment before him, v. 20. It does not appear that the country had yet any eye on him, because they had left it wholly to God to choose for them; but such a one they wished for; and his advancement would advance his family and relations, as Abner, and others.

To this strange intimation Saul returns a very modest answer, v. 21. The historian says (v. 1.) his father was a mighty man of power, yet he himself speaks diminishingly of his tribe and family, v. 21. Gideon had expressed himself thus, Judg. 6: 15. An humble disposition is a good presage of preferment.

Though the advancing of Saul would be the deposing of himself, yet Samuel envied him not, but was the first to honor him, in compliance with the will of God.

We may suppose the magistrates were with Samuel, who in their own city would claim precedency; yet the master of the feast made Saul and his servant too (who, if he were a king, must be respected as his prime minister of state) sit in the chiefest place, v. 22. Note, Civil respects must be paid those, who, in civil things, have the precedency by divine providence.

The right shoulder of the peace-offering was to be given to the priests, who were God's receivers: (Lev. 7: 32.) the next in honor, was the left shoulder, which, probably, was always allotted to those at the upper end of the table, and was wont to be Samuel's mess at other times; so that his giving it to Saul now, (v. 23, 24.) was an implicit resignation of his place to him.

Conversation passed between them in private, that evening and the next morning, on the flat roof of the house, v. 25, 26. We may suppose Samuel now told him of the people's desire of a king, the grounds of their desire, and God's grant of it; to all which, Saul, living very private, was perhaps a stranger; he satisfied him he was the person God had pitched upon for the government; and, we may suppose, gave him all the assurance he could desire, of his willingness to resign.

23 And Samuel said unto the cook, [f] Bring the portion which I gave thee, of which I said unto thee, Set it by thee.

24 And the cook took up [g] the shoulder, and that which was upon it, and set it before Saul. And Samuel said, Behold that which is § left, set it before thee, and eat; for unto this time hath it been kept for thee, since I said, I have invited the people. So Saul did eat with Samuel that day.

25 And when they were come down from the high place into the city, Samuel communed with Saul upon [h] the top of the house.

26 And they arose early: and it came to pass about the spring of the day, that Samuel called Saul to the top of the house, saying, [i] Up, that I may send thee away. And Saul arose, and they went out both of them, he and Samuel, abroad.

27 And as they were going down to the end of the city, Samuel said to Saul, [k] Bid the ser-

Early in the morning, he sent him toward home, brought him a part of the way, bade him send his servant before, that they might be private, (v. 27.) and there, as we find in the beginning of the next ch. anointed him, and therein showed him the word of the Lord; i. e. gave him full satisfaction that he was the person chosen to be king.

CHAP. X. V. 1—8. A great work is here doing, the setting up not only of a monarch, but of a monarchy itself, in Israel; therefore in all the advances towards it, much of God is seen.

Samuel here executes the office of a prophet, and assures Saul from God, that he should be king, as he accordingly was afterward.

I. He anointed and kissed him, v. 1. not in a solemn assembly, but by divine appointment, which made up the want of all external solemnities, nor was it ever the less valid for its being done in private. God's institutions are great and honorable, though the circumstances of their administration be ever so mean. 1. Samuel, by anointing Saul, assured him it was God's act to make him king, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee? The high priest was anointed to his office, which signified the conferring on him of the gifts requisite for the discharge of his office; and this was intimated in the anointing of kings. These sacred unctions, then used, pointed at the great Messiah, or anointed One, the King of the church, and High Priest of our profession, who was anointed with the oil of the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure, and above all the priests and princes of the Jewish church. No doubt, Samuel used common oil, and we read not of his blessing it. 2. By kissing him, he assured him of his own approbation of the choice; not only his consent, but his complacency, though it abridged his power, and eclipsed his glory, and the glory of his family. It was likewise a kiss of homage and allegiance; and in this sense we are commanded to kiss the Son, Ps. 2: 12. Samuel reminds him, (1.) Of the nature of the government of which he is anointed to be captain, which bespeaks care, toil, and danger. (2.) The origin of it; The Lord hath anointed thee. By Him he ruled, therefore he must rule for Him, in dependence on Him, and with an eye to his glory. (3.) Of the end of it; it is over his inheritance, to take care of that, protect it, and order all the affairs of it for the best, as a steward whom a great man sets over his estate, to manage it for his service, and give an account of it to him.

II. For further satisfaction, he gives him such signs, as would not only confirm the word of Samuel in general, but this word to Saul, that he should be king.

1. He directed him first to the sepulchre of one of his ancestors; there he must read a lecture of his own mortality, and now that he had a crown in his eye, must think of his grave, in which all his honor would be laid in the dust. Here two men would meet him, perhaps sent on purpose to look after him. It is good to eye Providence in favorable conjunctures, (though the matter be minute,) and to be encouraged to trust in greater matters.

2. He should next meet others going to Beth-el, where, it should seem, there was a high place for religious worship, and these men were bringing their sacrifices thither, v. 3, 4. It was a token for good to one designed for the government of Israel, wherever he came, to meet with people going to worship God. It is supposed the kids and loaves, and bottle of wine, the three men had, were designed for sacrifice, with the meat-offerings and drink-offerings to attend the sacrifice; yet Samuel tells Saul they would give him two of their loaves, and he must take them. This would look now like relieving a beggar. Saul must hereafter remember when he received alms, and therefore be humble and charitable. But, perhaps, it would then be construed, a fit present for a prince; and as such, Saul must receive it, the first brought him, by such as knew not what they did, nor why they did it; but God put it into their hearts, which made it the more fit to be a sign to him. This first tribute paid this new-anointed king, might serve to admonish him, not to spend the wealth of his crown in luxury, but still to be content with plain food.

3. The most remarkable sign would be his joining with a company of prophets he should meet, under the influence of a spirit of prophecy which should at that time come upon him. What God works in us by his Spirit serves much more to confirm faith, than any thing wrought for us by his providence. This would happen at the hill of God, supposed to be near Gibeah, his own city, for there was the Philistines' garrison, ch. 13: 3. Perhaps Samuel agreed they should have a garri-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are never more likely to be unhappy, than when we have our outward portion or connections, according to the choice of our own hearts: we ought therefore to beg of God in every thing to choose for us, and to teach us to acquiesce in his appointment.—True excellence of character does not result from external accomplishments; nor true felicity, from prosperous circumstances and outward splendor: and inattention to these obvious truths occasions the most fatal mistakes.—Diligence in business, and good behavior in relative life, are commendable, but no sure tokens of genuine piety, or acceptance with God.—We sensibly feel our temporal losses, and bestow much pains to retrieve them: but how little do we attempt the salvation of our souls, and how speedily are we weary in seeking it! Many speak of ministers as men of God, and honorable men, whose words will certainly come to pass, who neither comply with their exhortations, nor imitate their examples: and, being conscious that they do not choose to be at any expense in religion, they suspect, that the servants of God teach for hire, and will do nothing without pay. Indeed there have always been so great a majority of this character, that inattentive observers cannot readily understand the difference between mercenary diviners, and those who 'seek not theirs but them;' or between blind watchmen and guides, and those who are Seers indeed. But the seeing eye and the hearing ear are, in this sense also, from the Lord; and to those that wait on Him, He will communicate the truths, which He would have them communicate to the people. But how shall those who are blind themselves, be seers for other men; or point out to them that Savior, of whom they have no knowledge? (Is. 56: 9—12. Matt. 15: 12—14.)—True grace teaches us to honor those whom God has honored, though their advancement be attended by our degradation; but that respect should be shown in such a way, as may best tend to bring them acquainted with the truths and worship of God.—Without fervent prayer and praise, springing from a penitent, believing heart, a solemn sacrifice would have degenerated into a profane meal; and with them an ordinary meal becomes a spiritual sacrifice: but those who eat their food without thanking the Lord for it, or seeking his blessing on it, are scarcely distinguishable from brutes, or from atheists; and the examples of eminent persons, in such matters as these, may have a salutary effect on those around them.—How different are the Lord's purposes concerning us, from our intentions for ourselves! Many have taken long voyages and journeys, or moved their habitations, to seek riches and pleasures, who have been guided to places, where they have found the salvation of their souls; having met with those who addressed them, as if informed of the secrets of their lives and hearts; and having been thus led seriously to regard the message of the Lord delivered by them. If this has been our case, though our worldly projects have all been frustrated, let us cease caring about it; for the Lord has given us that which is infinitely better. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. (M. R. a. Notes, 2: 35, 36. 16: 13.)—The priests were anointed to their office, as types of Christ, and as implying their need of the communication of the Holy Spirit, to furnish them for their sacred work; and for the same reason the kings also were anointed. (Note, Ex. 29: 1—7.)—The law of Moses is silent as to the anointing of kings: but it seems to have been an ancient custom; (Judg. 9: 8.) and when prophets conformed to it by divine command, it obtained the force of a law. SCOTT.

'This anointing appears to have been done in the open field.—There was no order of God, that we read of, for the anointing of kings; but it had been an ancient custom, 200 years before this time, as appears from the parable of Jotham.' PATRICK.—'By the anointing of the Jewish kings, we are to understand the same as their inauguration. Private anointings were only prophetic symbols that the persons thus anointed should eventually receive the kingdom. As far as we are informed, however, unction, as a sign of investiture with the royal authority, was bestowed only on the first two kings who ruled the Hebrews, viz. Saul and David; and, subsequently, on Solomon and Joash, who ascended the throne under such circumstances, that there was danger of their right to the succession being forcibly disputed.' JAHN.

ing, What shall I do for my son?

3 Then shalt thou go on forward from thence, and thou shalt come to the plain of [i] Tabor, and there shall meet thee three men going up to God to [k] Bethel, one carrying three kids, and another carrying three loaves of bread, and another carrying a bottle of wine.

4 And they will [*] salute thee, and give thee two loaves of bread, which thou shalt receive of their hands.

5 After that, thou shalt come to the [m] hill of God, where is the garrison of the Philistines: and it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt meet [n] a company of prophets coming down from the high place, with [o] a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them; and they shall prophesy:

6 And the [p] Spirit of the LORD will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into [q] another man.

7 And [†] let it be, when these [r] signs are come unto thee, [‡] that thou do as occasion shall serve thee; for [s] God is with thee.

8 And thou shalt go down before me [t] to Gilgal; and, behold, I will come down unto thee, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings: [u] seven days shalt thou tarry, till I come to thee, and show thee what thou shalt do.

9 ¶ And it was so, that when he had turned his [§] back to go from Samuel, God [‖] gave him [x] another heart:

son there; or rather, after having been subdued, they got ground again, so far as to force this garrison into that place, and thence God raised up the man that should chastise them. There was a place called the hill of God, because one of the schools of the prophets was built on it; and such respect did even Philistines pay religion, that a garrison of their soldiers suffered a school of God's prophets to live peaceably by them, and did not only not dislodge them, but not restrain or disturb the public exercises of their devotion. These prophets were not (as it should seem) divinely inspired, but employed themselves in the study of the law, in instructing their neighbors, and in acts of piety, especially in praising God, wherein they were wonderfully assisted and enlarged by the Spirit of God. It was happy for Israel, they had such helpers in religion at this time. Now the Word of the Lord was not so precious, as when Samuel was first raised up, who had been instrumental in founding these colleges, whence, probably, the synagogues took their rise. What a pity, that Israel should be weary of the government of such a man! Music was then used to dispose the mind to receive the impressions of the good Spirit, as it did Elisha's; (2 Kings 3: 15.) but we have no reason to look for the same benefit by it now. These prophets had been at the high place, probably, offering sacrifice, and now came back singing psalms. We should come from holy ordinances with hearts greatly enlarged in holy joy and praise. Ps. 138: 5. Saul should find himself strongly moved to join them, and be turned thereby into another man from what he had been while in a private capacity. The Spirit of God, by his ordinances, wonderfully transforms men; Saul, by praising God in the communion of saints, became another man, but whether a new man or no, may be questioned.

III. He must follow Providence in ordinary cases; (v. 7.) but, in an extraordinary strait thereafter to befall him at Gilgal, and the most critical juncture, when he would have special need of divine aids, he must wait for Samuel seven days, v. 8. How his failing in this matter proved his fall we find afterwards, ch. 13: 11. It was a plain intimation, that he was upon his good behavior, and must act under the direction of Samuel. The greatest must own themselves in subjection to God and his Word.

V. 9—16. The signs Samuel gave came to pass very punctually; but what gave him the greatest satisfaction, was, he found immediately that God had given him another heart. A new fire was kindled in his breast; fighting the Philistines, redressing the grievances of Israel, making laws, administering justice, and providing for the public safety: these are the things that now fill his head. He never thought of such bravery and boldness before. He has no longer a heart selfish, low, Plain of Tabor.] Tabor, in the lot of Zebulun, or Issachar, (*M. Verses 5—10.

From the time of Samuel, it appears there were seminaries, where pious young men were educated, under the tuition of some approved prophets, in the knowledge of divine things; upon whom God was frequently pleased to bestow the Spirit of prophecy: and they were very useful in preserving some sense of true religion in the land, when the priests and Levites neglected their duty; as it must be concluded that they generally did at this time. (1 Kings 19: 20, 21. 2 Kings 2: 1, 3. 4: 1.)—The prophets frequently used solemn music, to compose their minds for the illapses of the Spirit of God; and many think they were immediately inspired to praise God in suitable hymns accompanying the music. (1 K. 3: 15. 1 Cor. 14: 26 —33.) In these Saul was supernaturally enabled to join. SCOTT.

(5.) Prophets.] 'Probably, the scholars of the prophets; for of the prophets, as accredited teachers, there appears not to have been any other at this time, besides Samuel.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—'By prophets here and in such places, we are to understand persons wholly devoted to religious studies and exercises, such as preaching, praying, and praising God; for the term prophesying is given, not only to the most eminent act of it, foretelling things to come, but also to preaching, as Rom. 12: 6. 1 Cor. 14: 31, 32. 1 Thess. 5: 20., and to the making or singing of psalms, or songs of praise to God, as 1 Chron. 25: 1—3. They that wholly attend upon these things are often called sons of the prophets.' POOLE.

Psaltery ... tabret ... pipe ... harp.] Nebel, toph, halil, kinnor. 'The MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS OF THE HEBREWS were; (1.) Stringed, as the nabel, and the psaltery, or psanneterim. These three names apparently signify nearly, or altogether, the same thing. They considerably resembled the harp; the ancient cythara, or the ashur, or the ten-stringed instrument; both were nearly of the figure of a triangle: but the nablum, or psaltery, was hollow toward the top, and played on toward the bottom; whereas the cythara, or ten-string instrument, (cut, Ps. 33: 2.) was played on at the upper part, and was hollow below: both were touched with a small bow, or fret, or by the fingers. The kinnor, or ancient lyre, [or harp,] had sometimes 6, sometimes 9 strings, strung from top to bottom; and sounded by means of a hollow belly over which they passed: they were touched with a small bow, or fret, or the finger. The ancient symphony was nearly the same as our viol. The sambuc was a stringed instrument, nearly the same as the modern psaltery. (2.) Wind instruments. We discover in Scripture various sorts of trumpets and flutes; of which it is difficult to ascertain the forms. [See the cuts from Herculaneum, &c. here, and 2 Sam. 6: 5. Long, plain pipes are found also on ancient Egyptian monuments.] The most remarkable is the ancient organ, Heb. uggab; the ancient pipe of Pan, (cut, Gen. 4: 21.) now common among us. (3.) Of drums there were many kinds. The Heb. toph (whence tympanum) is taken for all kinds of drums or timbrels. The zalzelim, commonly translated by the Sept. and Vulg. cymbala; instruments of brass, [still used,] of a very clattering sound, made in the form of a cap, or hat, and struck [the edge of] one against [the edge of] the other, while held one in each hand; [cut, 2 Sam. 6: 5.] Later interpreters by zalzelim understand the sistrum; anciently very common in Egypt. [See cut, 2 Sam. 6: 5.] It was nearly of an oval figure, and crossed by brass wires, which jingled on being shaken. The Heb. mentions an instrument called shalishim, which the Sept. transl. cymbala: but Jerome sistra. It is found only in 1 Sam. 18: 6. The term shalishim suggests, that it was of three sides, (triangular,) and it might be the ancient triangular instrument carrying on each side rings jingled by a stick, and giving a sharp, rattling sound; [cut, 18: 6.] the mezilothaim were of brass, and of a sharp sound. The word is generally translated cymbala: but by some, tintinnabula, little bells, countenanced by Zech. 14: 20. as anciently bells were worn by horses trained for war, to accustom them to noise.' (8.) The deliverance of Israel from the Philistines, though one great end of Saul's appointment to the kingdom, was not attempted till the second year of his reign. And at that time, Saul at Gilgal neglected to wait for Samuel, according to directions given him, which in some respects correspond with these. (13: 8—15.)—Saul was confirmed in the kingdom at Gilgal, when Samuel was present: (11: 14, 15.) and it is probable, Samuel purposed to seek direction, and a blessing

[Practical Observations.]

17 ¶ And Samuel called the people together [h] unto the LORD to Mizpeh;

18 And said unto the children of Israel, [i] Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, and of them that oppressed you.

mean, narrow, concerned only about corn and cattle; but a heart fit for a statesman, a general, a prince. Whom God calls to service He will make fit for it. If he advance to another station, He will give another heart, to those who sincerely desire to serve Him with their power.

When he came near home, to the hill, (v. 10.) i. e. Gibeah, or Geba, which signifies a hill; (so the Chald. here takes it as a proper name;) he met the prophets, as Samuel had told him, and the Spirit of God came upon him; strongly and suddenly, so the word signifies; but not so as to rest and abide upon him. He immediately joined with the prophets in their devotion.

Now, 1. His prophesying was publicly noticed, v. 11, 12. His acquaintance, when they saw him among the prophets, called one to another to come and see a strange sight. This school was near his father's house, but he had never associated with them, nor showed them any respect, perhaps had sometimes spoken slightly of them; and now to see him prophesying among them, was a surprise to them, as, long after, when his namesake, in the N. T. preached that Gospel he had before persecuted, Acts 9: 21. Where God gives another heart, it will soon show itself. One of them, wiser than the rest, asked, 'Who is their father, or instructer? Is it not God? And is He limited? Cannot He make Saul a prophet, as well as any of them, if He pleases?' Or, 'Is not Samuel their father?' Under God, he was so; and Saul had now lately been with him, which, by his servant, he might know. No marvel for him to prophesy, who lay, last night, under Samuel's roof. It became a proverb in Israel, when they would express their wonder at a bad man's either becoming good, or, at least, being found in good company, Is Saul among the prophets? Let not the worst be despaired of, yet let not an external show of devotion, and a sudden change for the present, be too much relied on; for Saul among the prophets, was Saul still.

But, 2. His being anointed was kept private. When he had done prophesying, it should seem he uttered all his words before the Lord, and recommended the affair to his favor, v. 13. but he industriously concealed it from his relations, v. 14, 15. This was an instance of humility, and of prudence. Thus it appears he had another heart, a heart fit for government. He leaves it to God to carry on his own work by Samuel.

V. 17—27. Saul's nomination to the throne is here made public, in a general assembly of the elders, the representatives of the respective tribes, at Mizpeh. Probably this convention was called as soon as conveniently it might be, after Saul was anointed, for, if there must be a change in their government, the sooner the better. The people being met in a solemn assembly, in which God was, in a peculiar manner, present, (and therefore it is said, they were called together unto the Lord, v. 17.) Samuel acts for God among them.

He reproves them for casting off the government of a prophet, and desiring that of a captain. He knew the peevishness of that people, and that there were those who would not acquiesce in the choice, if it depended on his single testimony; therefore, that every tribe, and every family of the chosen tribe, might please themselves with having a chance for it, he calls them to the lot, v. 19, 21. By this method it would appear to the people, as it already appeared to Samuel, that Saul was appointed of God to be king, for the disposal of the lot is of the Lord. It would also prevent all disputes and exceptions, for the lot causeth contention to cease, and parteth between the mighty.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. Many are employed in outward services to the Lord's people, who have not the unction of his sanctifying grace: yet the most eminent Christians and ministers must honor and obey God's authority in them.—The attentive believer, comparing the dispensations of Providence with the Word of God, will perceive his hand in the most ordinary concerns of life, as fulfilments of the Scripture, answers of prayer, and evidences of the Lord's peculiar kindness.—A superior care, in common life, swallows up an inferior one: but we are especially reminded, that a due concern about eternal things would moderate our care about the interests of this life.—Many changes may take place in the language, conduct, and disposition of him, who is not born of God: another man he may become, and yet not a new creature; another heart he may have, but not a holy heart: he may be qualified for ruling or preaching, and yet not be 'made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light;' nay, he may prophesy and work miracles, and yet be a child of the devil.—Sudden changes are generally to be suspected: but when we consider who makes the Christian and the prophet, we need not be offended, should some of our former ungodly acquaintance become professors or even preachers of the Gospel: true conversion makes a great change in a man's character.—We should enter on every enterprise, with a reference to God's authority and worship, and depending on the guidance of the Holy Spirit.—We may freely speak of those things which are honorable to others; but in general it is best to be silent, as to those transactions which tend to our own reputation. Verses 17—23.

'God, in the character of King, had governed the Israelites for sixteen ages. He ruled on terms which He Himself, through the agency of Moses, had proposed to them, viz. that if they observed their allegiance to Him, they should be prosperous: if not, adversity and 19 And [k] ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations: and ye have said unto him, Nay, but set a king over us. Now therefore present yourselves before the LORD [l] by your tribes, and by your thousands.

20 And when Samuel had [m] caused all the tribes of Israel to come near, the tribe of Benjamin was taken.

21 When he had caused the tribe of Benjamin to come near by their families, the family of Matri was taken, and Saul the son of Kish was taken, and when they sought him he could not be found.

22 Therefore they [n] inquired of the LORD further, if the man should yet come thither. And the LORD answered, Behold, he hath [o] hid himself among the stuff.

23 And they ran and fetched him thence: and when he stood among the people, [p] he was higher than any of the people, from his shoulders and upward.

24 And Samuel said to all the people, [q] See ye him whom the LORD hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people? And all the people shouted, and said, *God save the king.

With much ado, and not without further inquiries of the Lord, Saul is at length produced. When every one expected he should answer to his name at the first call, none could find him, (v. 21.) he had hid himself among the stuff, v. 22. So little fond was he now of that power, which yet, when he was in possession of, he could not without the utmost indignation think of parting with. We may suppose he was at this time really averse to the government, because conscious of unfitness: because it would expose him to envy: because he understood, by what Samuel had said, that the people sinned in asking a king, and it was in anger God granted their request: and because the affairs of Israel were at this time in a bad posture: the Philistines were strong, the Ammonites threatening.

But the congregation, believing the choice well made, which God Himself made, would leave no way untried to find him out, on whom the lot fell. v. 23. Note, None will be losers at last by humility and modesty. Honor, like the shadow, follows those that flee from it, but flees from those that pursue it.

Samuel presents him to the people, and they accept of him, v. 23. 'Look you,' said Samuel, 'what a king God has chosen for you, just such a one as you wished for; there is none like him among all the people, that has so much majesty in his countenance, and such a graceful stateliness in his mien; he is in the crowd like the cedar among the shrubs. Let your own eyes be judges, is he not a brave and gallant man?' The people hereupon signified their approbation of the choice, and their acceptance of him; Let the king live; i. e. let him long reign over us, in health and prosperity.' Subjects were wont to testify their affection and allegiance to their prince, by their good wishes, and those turned (as our translation does this) into addresses to God, Ps. 72: 15.

Samuel settles the original contract between them, and leaves it on record, v. 25. He had before told them the manner of the king, (ch. 8: 11.) how he would abuse his power; now he tells them the manner of the kingdom, or rather, the law, or judgment, or constitution, of it; what power the prince might challenge, and the utmost the subject might claim. Let them rightly understand one another at first, and let the agreement remain in black and white; that will preserve a good understanding between them ever after. Patrick thinks, he now repeated and registered what he had told them, (ch. 8: 11.) of the arbitrary power their kings would assume, that it might hereafter be a witness against them, that they had drawn the calamity on themselves.

25 Then Samuel told the people [r] the manner of the kingdom, and

The convention was dissolved when the solemnity was over; Samuel sent every man to his house. Here were no votes past, nor, for aught that appears, so much as a motion made, for the raising of money to support the dignity of their new elected king; if therefore he afterward think fit to take what they do not think fit to give, (which it was necessary he should have,) they must thank themselves. Saul returns to Gibeah, to his father's house; but there he had no palace, no throne, no court. Such a humble spirit as this, puts a beauty and lustre on great advancements. The condition rising, and the mind not rising with it, behold, how good and pleasant it is!

But how did the people stand affected to their new king? The generality of them, it should seem, did not show themselves much concerned; their own domestic affairs lay nearer their hearts, than any interests of the public. But, 1. There were some so faithful as to attend him, v. 26. Not the body of the people, but a band, a small company, who, either because fond of their own choice of a king, or because pleased with God's choice of this king, or because they had so much more sense than their neighbors, as to conclude, that if he were a king, he ought to be respected accordingly, went with him to Gibeah, as his lifeguard. They were those whose hearts God had touched, in this instance, to do their duty. Note, Whatever good there is in us, or done by us, at any time, it must be ascribed to the grace of God.

misery should be the consequence. We learn from the whole book of Judges, and from the first eight chapters of Samuel, how exactly the result, from Joshua to Samuel, agreed with these conditions. But now, in point of form, the government was changed into a monarchy.' JAHN.

(17—22) (*M. The manner of the kingdom.] Probably this writing contained the rules of the government; or, in modern language, the prerogatives of the prince, and the privileges of the people. 'The manner of the kingdom' would differ considerably from 'the manner of the king,' before mentioned: the one being the appointment of God, and the other the effect of human depravity, when intrusted with absolute authority. (8: 10—18. Deut. 17: 14—18.) SCOTT.

'Duties of the Heb. Kings. At first, kings acted as generals, as judges, and as high-priests, Gen. 14: 18, 19. Hence cohen means both a priest, and the supreme civil magistrate, Ex. 2: 16. 3: 1. and so at 2 Sam. 8: 18. comp. 1 Chron. 18: 19. The Heb. kings were not however allowed to exercise the sacred functions, 2 Sam. 15: 1, &c. 2 Chron. 26: 16, &c. They had the oversight of them, nevertheless, so far as to see that all things were done rightly, a privilege well used by David, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, but abused by others to introduce idolatry. The Hebrews were accustomed to expect of their kings the fulfilment of two offices at least, those of judge and chieftain; these they did fulfil, either themselves, or by others they had chosen, 1 Sam. 8: 5. 12: 12. comp. 2 Chr. 26: 21. Is. 16: 5. The Mosaic institutions recognised inferior judges, and the kings had only the trouble of selecting them, and seeing that they did their duty, 1 Chr. 23: 4. 26: 29, &c. 2 Chr. 19: 5—11. It was the duty of the king to try appeals from these judges: a much better course than to try all or most causes himself, 2 Sam. 15: 2, &c. 1 Sam. 17: 9—19.

'Extent of royal power and prerogatives. Asiatic kings exercise most unlimited and arbitrary power; yet it was not always so in all instances, for the power of the Phœnician and Philistine kings was restricted. (Moses Deut. 17: 14—20.) imposed certain conditions on after-kings, and the "elders of Israel," i. e. those who had the principal civil management, exacted conditions in writing, respecting the manner of exercising government, both from David and Saul, which they received with an oath for themselves and their successors, 1 Sam. 10: 25. 2 Sam. 5: 3. comp. 1 K. 12: 1—18. The heads of tribes, or princes, possessed of themselves also very great power, and so far may be considered as having a negative on the authority of the king. The prophets too, felt at liberty, in the character of divine messengers, to reprove those monarchs, who had violated their prerogative by doing wrong. But still many kings abused power. As he was vicegerent of Jehovah, (a point very clearly established in the Mosaic Institutes,) it was the king's duty and right, of course, to secure obedience to the laws of the state, and to punish the violations of them. From 2 Sam. 14. we infer that the Heb. kings sometimes dispensed, on their own authority, with the infliction of the penalty threatened by the Mosaic laws; but this liberty was certainly rarely taken by those kings who had a well founded claim to be called religious. Comp. David's conduct, 2 Sam. 21: 1—14, and 1 K. 2: 1—9.

'Laws were promulgated to the people, in Moses' and Joshua's time by genealogists. (Eng. vers. officers.) The laws of the kings were proclaimed by criers, (Jer. 34: 8, 9. Joh. 3: 5—7.) Dan. 3: 4. 5: 29. They were made known in distant provinces, towns, and cities, by messengers, 1 Sam. 11: 7. Am. 4: 5. 2 Chr. 36: 22. Ezra 1: 1. This message was publicly announced when the messenger arrived in the gate of the city, or in some other public place: at Jerusalem, in the temple, where were always many assembled: whence also the prophecies were uttered here, being edicts of God, the supreme King. Here too the learned, the Savior Himself, and the Apostles taught, Jer. 7: 2, &c. Matt. 26: 25. Acts 5: 11.

'The royal revenues. Conquerors exacted both tribute and menial services of the conquered, but it does not appear that kings exacted of their own people, arbitrarily, either labor, or burdens, Gen. 47: 13—27. Herod. III. 97. In fact the Hebrews were so tenacious of their rights in this respect, that they defined, in express terms, by a particular agreement, what services should be rendered to the king, and what he could legally require, 1 Sam. 10: 25. 2 Sam. 5: 3. We know not precisely what these terms were, but they certainly did not

CHAP. XI.

Nahash, the Ammonite, encamps against Jabesh-gilead, and offers the inhabitants most cruel and disgraceful terms; who obtain seven days' respite, 1—3. They send messengers to Gibeah, and Saul delivers them, and smites the Ammonites, 4—11. Saul will not allow his despisers to be punished, 12, 13. He is made king in Gilgal, 14, 15.

THEN [a] Nahash the Ammonite came up and encamped against [b] Jabesh-gilead: and all the men of Jabesh said unto Nahash, [c] Make a covenant with us, and we will serve thee.

One touch is enough, when divine. 2. There were others so spiteful as to affront him. Thus differently are men affected to our exalted Redeemer. God hath set Him King on the holy hill of Zion. A remnant submit to Him, rejoice in Him, bring Him presents, and follow Him wherever He goes; and they are such whose hearts God has touched, whom He has made willing in the day of his power: but others despise Him, who ask, How shall this man save us? They are offended in Him, stumble at his external meanness, and they will be broken by it.

Saul held his peace; marg. Was as though he had been deaf. So far from resenting it, he seemed not to notice it. Which evinced both his humility, modesty, and mercifulness, and also, that he was well satisfied with his title; for those are commonly most jealous of their honor, and most revengeful of affronts, that gain their power by improper means.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—4. In this ch. we have the first-fruits of Saul's government, in the glorious rescue of Jabesh-gilead out of the hands of t' e Ammonites. Let not Israel thence infer, they t erefore did well to ask a king.

1. The Ammonites were bad neighbors to the tribes of Israel next them, though descendants from just Lot, and, for that reason, ostensibly civil to Israel. See Deut 2: 19. Jephthah, in his time, had humbled them, but now Israel's sin had prepared the way for them to make head again, and avenge that quarrel. Jabesh-gilead had been, some ages ago, destroyed by Israel, for not appearing against the wickedness of Gibeah; (Judg. 21: 10.) and now being replenished again, probably, by the posterity of those that then escaped the sword, it is in danger of being destroyed by the Ammonites, as if some bad fate attended the place. Nahash, king of Ammon, (1 Chron. 19: 1.) laid siege to it, and they ask the terms of surrender to him. Had they not broken their covenant with God, and forsaken his service, they needed not thus to have courted a covenant with a Gentile nation, and offered themselves to serve them.

2. The besiegers offer them base and barbarous conditions; their abject concessions make them more insolent in their demands; they cannot be content to have them their servants, but, must torment them, disable them for war, and render them incapable, though not of labor, which would have been their loss, yet of bearing arms; for in those times they fought with shields in their left hands, which covered their left eye, so that a soldier without his right eye, was, in effect, blind: thus they would put a reproach on all Israel, as weak and cowardly, that would suffer the inhabitants of one of their chief cities to be thus miserably used, and not offer to rescue them.

3. The besieged desire, and obtain, seven days' time to consider this proposal, v. 3. Had not Nahash granted this respite, we may suppose, in view of the horror of the proposal, they would rather have died with their swords in their hands, than have surrendered; but Nahash, not imagining it possible they should in so short a time have relief, in a bravado, gave them seven days, that the reproach on Israel, for not rescuing them, might be the greater, and his triumph the more illustrious. But there was a providence in it, that his security might be his infatuation and ruin.

4. Notice of this is sent to Gibeah. Not finding Saul, the messengers told their news to the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—27. The Lord will bring to a seasonable determination those affairs, which are referred to Him: but the gratification of inordinate desires is short-lived, and expires in disappointment and vexation. It is good to be conscious of our unworthiness and insufficiency for the services to which we are called; and to avoid ostentation, and whatever may excite envy and opposition: but we should be careful not to run into the opposite extreme, by refusing the employments to which the Lord calls us, through meanness of spirit and unbelief. Indeed, high stations are heavy burdens, when the duties of them are conscientiously attended on: and the comfort of them is but small; for the heart of man is prone to envy all who are preferred. (18: 6—9. Ec. 4: 4—6.) Our natural enmity to God disposes us to despise and oppose the instruments He selects for the government of states, and for promoting his cause: and if some approve, honor, and help them, they will be reviled and contemned by others. But we should wait his will with patience, and without discouragement; bear scorn and malice in silent meekness; and attend to the duties of our station, acording to the manner of it: thus the fatal effects of discord will be prevented, and in due season the Lord will plead our cause, and all opposition will fall before us.—Men seldom receive that with thankfulness, which they sought with too great eagerness: for their expectations are not exactly answered, and this occasions dissatisfaction and sullen discontent. And when any welcome with gratitude the appointments of God, and set themselves cordially to promote his cause; (even the cause of Christ our anointed King, whom so many 'children of Belial' despise;) they are those alone, whose hearts He has touched by his grace; and to Him all the praise belongs. (Ezra 1: 1—4. John 6: 41—46.)

The collection and management of imposts and taxes appear to have been committed to the officers mentioned, 1 K. 4: 6—9. 1 Chr. 27: 25. The tax was increased in the reign of Solomon; and the people at his death wished it diminished, 1 K. 12: 13. NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—3. The Ammonites probably renewed the claims

2 And Nahash the Ammonite answered them, [d] On this condition will I make a covenant with you, that [e] I may thrust out all your right eyes, and lay it for [f] a reproach upon all Israel.

3 And the elders of Jabesh said unto him, * Give us seven days' respite, that we may send messengers unto all the coasts of Israel: and then, if there be no man to save us, we will come out to thee.

4 Then came the messengers to [g] Gibeah of Saul, and told the tidings in the ears of the people; and all the people [h] lifted up their voices and wept.

5 And, behold, Saul came [i] after the herd out of the field; and Saul said, [j] What aileth the people that they weep? And they told him the tidings of the men of Jabesh.

6 And the [k] Spirit of God came upon Saul when he heard those tidings, and [l] his anger was kindled greatly.

7 And he took a yoke of oxen, and [m] hewed them in pieces, and sent them throughout all the coasts of Israel by the hands of messengers, saying, [n] Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen. And [o] the fear of the LORD fell on the people, and they came out † with one consent.

8 And when he numbered them in [p] Bezek, [q] the children of Israel were three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand.

9 And they said unto the messengers that came, Thus shall ye say unto the men of Jabesh-gilead, To-morrow, by that time the sun be hot, ye shall have ‡ help. And the messengers came and showed it to the men of Jabesh; and they were glad.

10 Therefore the men of Jabesh said, [r] To-morrow we will come out unto you, and ye shall do with us all that seemeth good unto you.

people, who fell a weeping upon it, v. 4. as despairing to help the men of Jabesh-gilead, and fearing, lest, if that frontier city were lost, the enemy would penetrate into the very bowels of their country.

V. 5—11. Observe here,

I. Saul's humility. Though anointed king, and accepted, he did not think it below him to know the state of his own flocks, v. 5. This was an evidence he was not puffed up, as those are most apt to be, that are raised from a mean estate. Providence had not yet found him business as a king, he left all to Samuel. He had no revenues settled on him to support his dignity, and he would not be burdensome to the people; therefore, like Paul, he worked with his hands. Solomon gives it as a reason why men should look well to their herds, because the crown doth not endure to every generation. Saul's did not, he must therefore provide something surer.

II. His concern for his neighbors; v. 5. (good magistrates are in pain, if their subjects be in tears;) and zeal for the safety and honor of Israel. When he heard of the insolence of the Ammonites, and the distress of a city, a mother in Israel, the Spirit of God came upon him, and put great thoughts into his mind, v. 6. He was angry at the insolence of the Ammonites, at the mean and sneaking spirit of the men of Jabesh-gilead, and that they had not sent him notice sooner of their extremity. He was angry to see his neighbors weeping, when it had been fitter to have prepared for war. It was a brave and generous fire that was now kindled in his breast, and such as became his high station.

III. The power he exerted, on this important occasion; he soon let Israel know, that, though retired to his privacy, he had a care for the public, and knew how to command men, as well as cattle, v. 5, 7. He summoned all Israel, to show the extent of his power beyond his own tribe, even all the tribes, and ordered all the military men forthwith to appear in arms at Bezek Observe, 1. His modesty, in joining Samuel in commission with himself; he would not execute the office of a king, without a due regard to that of a prophet. 2. His mildness, in the penalty threatened against those that should disobey. Their oxen only, not themselves, should be hewed in pieces if they did not obey. God had threatened it as a great judgment, Deut. 28: 31. It was necessary the command should be enforced with some penalty, but this was not near so severe as that affixed to the like order by the whole congregation, Judg. 21. 5. Saul wished to show, his government was more gentle than that they had been under. He did not affect to make them fear him, but they were influenced to observe his orders by the fear of God, who had made him their king, and them members one of another. Note, Religion and the fear of God will make men good subjects, good soldiers, good friends to the public interests of their country. They that fear God, will make conscience of their duty to all men, particularly to their rulers.

IV. His prudent proceedings, v. 8. In this muster, it seems, Judah, though numbered by itself, made no great figure, for as it was one tribe of twelve, so it was but an eleventh part of the whole number; though the rendezvous was at Bezek, in that tribe, they wanted either the numbers, or the courage, or the zeal, that that tribe used to be famous for; [or, as is perhaps more likely, were jealous of the power of Benjamin;] so low was the tribe, just before the sceptre was brought into it in David.

V. His faith and confidence, and (grounded on that) his courage and resolution, in this enterprise. It should seem the messengers which brought the tidings from Jabesh-gilead, Saul sent into the country to raise the militia, and them he now sends back to their distressed countrymen, with the assurance of relief the next day, v. 9. (in which, probably, Samuel encouraged him). Saul knew he had a just cause, therefore doubted not of success.

VI. His industry and close application to this business. Had he been bred to war from his youth, and led regiments as often as he had followed droves, he could not have gone about an affair of this nature more dexterously, or diligently. The Spirit of the Lord upon men, makes them expert, even without experience. A vast army (especially in comparison with present usage) Saul had now at his foot, and a long march before him, near 60 miles, over Jordan too; no cavalry, but all infantry, in three battalions, v. 11. And observe, here, with what incredible swiftness he flew to the enemy; in a day and a night. He had passed his word, and would not break it: nay, he was better than his word, he promised help next day, by that time the sun was hot, (v. 9.) but brought it before day, v. 11. Whom God helps He helps right early.

Lastly, To complete his honor, God crowned all these virtues with success, v. 11. We may

Verse 4, 5.

In this chapter Saul looks as great as the much celebrated Roman dictator from the plough, and indeed greater. For Saul followed his herds, after he was appointed to the kingdom by God Himself; yet when called forth to action, his vigor and success were not at all inferior to those of the renowned Roman. Verses 6—11.

Through the immediate influence of God on their hearts, a very great multitude assembled with surprising celerity.—In this public service, it is said, that 'the Spirit of God came on Saul,' and in this alone. (10: 5—7. 16: 13, 14.) SCOTT.

11 And it was so [s]on the morrow, that Saul put the people [t]in three companies, and they came into the midst of the host in the [u]morning-watch, and [x]slew the Ammonites until the heat of the day: and it came to pass, that they which remained were scattered, [y]so that two of them were not left together.

12 ¶ And the people said unto Samuel, [z]Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? bring the men, that we may put them to death.

13 And Saul said, [a]There shall not a man be put to death this day: for to-day [b]the LORD hath wrought salvation in Israel.

14 Then said Samuel to the people, Come, and [c]let us go to Gilgal, and [d]renew the kingdom there.

15 And all the people went to Gilgal; and there they made Saul king [e]before the LORD in Gilgal; and [f]there they sacrificed sacrifices of peace-offerings before the LORD; and there Saul and all the men of Israel [g]rejoiced greatly.

CHAP. XII.

Samuel, before Israel, avows his integrity, and the people fully justify him, 1—5. He expostulates with them, for their ingratitude, in rejecting the government of God, and warns them against disobedience, 6—15. To show their guilt in asking a king, he calls for thunder and rain in time of harvest, which greatly dismays them, 16—18. He promises to instruct and pray for them, and encourages them to cleave to the service of God, and to trust in his mercy, 20—25.

AND Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold, [a]I have hearkened unto your voice in all that ye said unto me, and [b]have made a king over you.

2 And now, behold, the king [c]walketh before you: and [d]I am old and gray-headed; and, behold, [e]my sons are with you: and [f]I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day.

suppose Saul was the more vigorous in this matter, 1. Because there was some alliance between the tribe of Benjamin and the city of Jabesh-gilead. That city had declined joining the rest of Israel to destroy Gibeah, which was then punished as their crime, but, perhaps, was now remembered as their kindness. Further, two thirds of the Benjamites that then remained, were provided with wives from that city, (Judg. 21: 14.) so that most of the mothers of Benjamin were daughters of Jabesh-gilead; for it therefore Saul, (a Benjamite,) had a particular kindness; and we find they returned his kindness, ch. 31: 11, 12. 2. Because it was the Ammonites' invasion that induced the people to desire a king, (so Samuel says, ch. 12: 12.) so that if he had not done his part in this expedition, he had disappointed their expectations, and had for ever forfeited their respect.

V. 12—15. I. The people took this occasion to show their jealousy of the honor of Saul, and their resentment of the indignities done him. Saul's good fortune (as foolish men commonly call it) thus went further to confirm his title, than either his choice by lot, or Samuel's anointing him. They had not courage to persecute opposers till now that his victory made him look great, but now, nothing will serve but they must be put to death.

II. Saul took this occasion to give further proofs of his clemency, for, without waiting for Samuel's answer, he himself quashed the motion, v. 13. There shall not a man be put to death this day, no, not those men, those bad men, that had abused him, and therein reflected on God Himself. It was a day of joy and triumph, and he hoped they were now convinced that, under God, he could save them: and, if they be but reclaimed, he is secured from receiving any disturbance by them; if an enemy be made a friend, that is more to our advantage than to have him slain. And all good princes consider that their power is for edification, not for destruction.

III. Samuel took this occasion to call the people together before the Lord in Gilgal, v. 14, 15. that they might publicly give God thanks for their late victory, and confirm Saul in the government, more solemnly than it had been yet done, to prevent his retiring again to his obscurity. Samuel would have the kingdom renewed; he would renew his resignation, and the people should renew their approbation; and so, in concurrence with, or rather in attendance on, the divine nomination, they made Saul king, making it their own act and deed to submit to him.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—5. We left the general assembly of the states together, in the close of the ch. foregoing; in this, we have Samuel's speech to them, when he resigned the government to Saul This is his farewell sermon to that august assembly, and Saul's coronation sermon.

I. Samuel gives a short account of the late revolution, and of the present posture of government by way of preface, v. 1, 2. For his own part, he had spent his days in their service; he began as soon as he was illuminated with the light of prophecy in his early days, and had continued till now he was old and gray-headed; therefore they were the more unkind to cast him off; yet therefore he was the more willing to resign. Old, and therefore the more able to advise them; the more observant they should be of what he said, for days shall speak, and the multitude of years shall teach wisdom; and there is a particular reverence owing to the aged, especially aged magistrates and aged ministers 'Old, and therefore not likely to live long; perhaps may never have an opportunity of speaking to you again, therefore note what I say.' As for his sons: 'Behold,' (says he,) 'they are with you; on a level with you, subjects to the new king as well as you; if you can prove them guilty of any wrong, prosecute them now by a due course of law, punish them, and oblige them to make restitution.' As for your new king, I have gratified you in setting him over you, v. 1. 'I have hearkened to your voice in all that ye said to me, being desirous to please you, if it were possible, and make you easy, though to the discarding of myself and family; and now, will you hearken to me, and take my advice?' And the change is now perfected; 'Behold, the king walketh before you; (v. 2.) he appears in public, ready to serve you. Now that you have made yourselves like the nations in your civil government, and cast off the divine administration, take heed lest you make yourselves like the nations in religion, and cast off the worship of God.'

II. He solemnly appeals to them concerning his own integrity in the administration of the government, v. 3. There is a just debt which every man owes to his own good name, especially men in public stations, which is, to guard against unjust aspersions and suspicions, that we may finish our course with honor, as well as joy. He designed also to leave a good name behind him,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Hasty settlements among bad neighbors often produce multiplied calamities: (Note, Num. 32: 29.)—To save their lives men often part with their liberty, and will even consent to lose their eyes: how much more then is it our wisdom, to part with our right eye, rather than to be cast into hell-fire!—The Lord, in providence, will make way for those, whom He has designed and prepared for usefulness: nor shall any repent of humbly waiting in obscurity and honest industry, till He is pleased to call them forth. —The reproach of the Gospel, the distresses of the Lord's people, and the insulting triumphs of their enemies, should not only excite our sympathizing sorrows, but our most decisive exertions in our several stations, yea, our warm and generous indignation. But magistrates in all cases should be sparing of the lives of their subjects, and only punish them in their property, where that can be made effectual.—Humility and clemency add superior lustre to the most splendid actions; he who forgives his enemies, when he has them in his power, obtains the noblest victory; (Prov. 16: 32.) and by giving the praise of illustrious exploits to God, a man acquires the most solid honor.—The Lord delights to plead the cause of those, who are dumb under injuries, and plead not for themselves; to put to silence those who contend with his servants; and to work by instruments man contemns.—Thus the despised Savior will at length be universally acknowledged as the Lord's anointed King, with songs of triumph and praise: at present, before the mercy-seat, He receives the submissions and pleads the cause of rebels, who are willing He should reign over and save them; but shortly, from his righteous tribunal, He will condemn to everlasting ruin all who persist in contempt of Him and opposition to Him.

SCOTT.

Verses 12—15.

In all this, Saul's conduct was unexceptionable; and the whole concludes with such humanity and apparent piety, as promised far better effects than those which followed. (M. R.—Note, Ps. 36: 3, 4.)

¶ Heb. mouth.

1: 18. The work of ministers is, to reason with people; not only to exhort and direct, but to persuade; to convince the judgment, and so gain the will and affections. Let reason rule men, and they will be good. He reasons of the righteous acts of the Lord. His favors are called his righteous acts, (Judg. 5: 11.) because in them He is just to his own honor. He not only reminds them of what God had done for them in their days, but of what He had done of old, in the days of their fathers, because the present age had the benefit of God's former favors. We may suppose his discourse was much larger than as here related. We read not of Bedan, elsewhere: he might be some eminent person, instrumental of salvation to them, though not recorded in the book of Judges; (such a one as Shamgar, of whom it is said, that he delivered Israel, but not that he judged them, Judg. 3: 31.) perhaps, he guarded and delivered them on one side, at the time some other judge appeared and acted for them on the other. Some think it was the same with Jair, so Mr. Poole; others, the same with Samson, who was Ben Dan, a son of Dan; and the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, Be-Dan, in Dan, in the camp of Dan. Samuel mentions himself, not to his own praise, but to the honor of God, who had made him an instrument.

At last, he reminds them of God's late favor to the present generation, in gratifying them with a king, when they would prescribe to God, by such a one, to save them out of the hand of Nahash, king of Ammon, v. 12, 13. He told them God was Commander-in-chief in all their wars, and they needed no other.

II. He shows them, they were now on their good behavior, they and their king; let them not think they had cut themselves off from all dependence on God, and that now, having a king of their own, the making of their own fortunes (as men foolishly call it) was in their own hands; no, still words intimate that Samuel had deprived them of their public employment, and reduced them to the level of the common people.'

Dr. A. Clarke.

(M. R.—Notes, Judg. 6:—11:) Bedan may be considered as a contraction of Ben-dan, or the son of Dan; and it is probable that Samson is intended. (Judg. 13:—18: The Sept. has Barak.—Samuel joins himself to the number of those, by whom the Lord had delivered the people; to impress more deeply on their minds the conviction, that, in rejecting him, they had refused to continue any longer under the immediate government of God, by judges of his appointment, which had been their honor and happiness. Scott.

(11.) Bedan.] 'Jair, the Manassite, Judg. 10: 3. so some, because here named after Gideon and before Jephthah; and because he was the grandson of Machir the Manassite, who is called Bedan, 1 Chron. 7· 17. a name given him to distinguish him from an elder Jair, descended from Manasseh, Num. 32: 41.' Assemb. Ann.—'Houbigant, on the authority of the Sept. reads, "Barak," instead of Bedan; and, following the Syriac and Arabic versions, substitutes 'Samson" for "Samuel." Indeed it is not probable Samuel would enumerate himself. Therefore the list of names was originally, perhaps, Jerubbaal, Deborah, and Barak, Jephthah and Samson. This seems confirmed, in some measure, by the author of Heb. 11: 20.' Hewlett.

(12.) 'The word nay seems to signify that Samuel told them God would be with them to deliver them; or that he offered himself to be their leader under God; but they refused his offer, and continued to demand a king.' Patrick.

Verse 14.

Following, &c.] Depending on God, adhering to his worship and service, and protected by Him; and so, a holy and happy people. (15: 11. Num. 14· 24. Hos. 6: 1—3.) Scott.

the LORD, then shall both ye, and also the king that reigneth over you, * continue following the LORD your God.

15 But if [r] ye will not obey the voice of the LORD, but rebel against the commandment of the LORD; then shall the hand of the LORD be against you, as it was [s] against your fathers.

16 Now therefore [t] stand and see this great thing, which the LORD will do before your eyes.

17 Is it [u] not wheat-harvest to-day? [x] I will call unto the LORD, and he shall send thunder and rain; that ye may perceive and see that [y] your wickedness is great, which ye have done in the sight of the LORD, in asking you a king.

18 So Samuel called unto the LORD; and the LORD [z] sent thunder and rain that day; and all the people greatly [a] feared the LORD and Samuel.

19 And all the people said unto Samuel, [b] Pray for thy servants unto the LORD thy God, that we die not: for we have added unto all our sins this evil, to ask us a king.

20 And Samuel said unto the people, [c] Fear not: (ye have done all this wickedness: yet turn not aside from following the LORD, but serve the LORD with all your heart;

21 And [d] turn ye not aside: for then should ye go after * vain things, which [f] cannot profit nor deliver; for they are vain:)

22 For [g] the LORD will not forsake his people [h] for his great name's sake; because [i] it hath pleased the LORD to make you his people.

23 Moreover, as for me, [k] God forbid that I should sin against the LORD † in ceasing to pray for you: but [l] I will teach you [m] the good and the right way.

24 Only [n] fear the LORD, and serve him [o] in truth with all your heart: for [p] consider ‡ how great things he hath done for you.

25 But [q] if ye shall still do wickedly, ye their judgment must proceed from the Lord. He tells them plainly,

Their obedience to God would certainly be their happiness, v. 14. but observe how the promise is expressed, Then ye shall continue following the Lord your God; i. e 'Ye shall continue in the way of your duty to God, which will be your honor and comfort.' Note, Those that follow God faithfully, God will enable to continue following Him. And observe, Following God is a work that is its own wages. Their disobedience would as certainly be their ruin; (v. 15.) We mistake if we think we can evade God's justice by shaking off his dominion. If God shall not rule us, yet He will judge us.

V. 16—25. Two things Samuel here aims at:

I. To convince the people of their sin in desiring a king. They were now rejoicing before God, on the occasion of having a king; and this perhaps made them think that there was no harm in their asking a king, but that really they had done well in it; therefore Samuel here charges it upon them as their sin, as wickedness, great wickedness in the sight of the Lord, v. 17. Note, Though we meet with prosperity and success in a way of sin, yet we must not therefore think the more favorably of it. Samuel made it appear that this thunder and rain was designed by God, to convince them they had done very wickedly, not only by its coming in an unusual time, in wheat harvest, and this on a fair, clear day, but by his giving notice of it before, v. 16, 17. He had bidden them stand and hear, (v. 7.) but because he did not see that his reasoning with them affected them, now he bids them stand and see. He appealed to this as a sign.

This storm startled the people very much, as well it might. (1.) They greatly feared the Lord and Samuel. They had a king, and were ready to think they must fear him only, but God made them know that He is greatly to be feared, and his prophets for his sake. (2.) They own their sin and folly in desiring a king, v. 19. Samuel did not extort this confession from them till the matter was settled, and the king confirmed, lest it should look as if he designed by it rather to establish himself in the government, than to bring them to repentance. (3.) They earnestly begged Samuel's prayers, v. 19. Now they see their need of him whom awhile ago they slighted. Thus many that will not have Christ to reign over them, would yet be glad to have Him to intercede for them, to turn away the wrath of God. And the time may come, when those that have despised and ridiculed praying people, will value their prayers, and desire a share in them. 'Pray' (said they) 'to the Lord thy God; we know not how to call Him ours, but if thou have any interest in Him, improve it for us.'

II. He aims to confirm the people in their religion, and engage them for ever to cleave unto the Lord. The design of his discourse is much the same with Joshua's, ch. 23. and 24.

1. He would not that the terrors of the Lord should frighten them from Him, for they were intended to frighten them to Him, v. 20. Fear not; i. e. 'Despair not, fear not with amazement; the weather will clear up after the storm. Fear not; though God will frown upon his people, yet He will not forsake them, (v. 22.) for his great name's sake; do not you forsake Him then.' Every transgression in the covenant, though it displease the Lord, yet does not throw us out of covenant, and therefore God's just rebukes must not drive us from our hopes in his mercy. The fixedness of God's choice is owing to the freeness of it; we may therefore hope He will not forsake his people, because it has pleased Him to make them his people. Had He chosen them for their good merits, we might fear He would cast them off for their bad merits: but, choosing them for his name's sake, for his name's sake He will not leave them.

2. He cautions them against idolatry, and so far from upbraiding them with their disrespect to him, he promises them much more than they asked. (1.) They asked his prayers as a favor; he promised them as a duty, and startles at the thought of neglecting to pray for them. Note, It is a sin against God, not to pray for the Israel of God, especially those under our charge: and good men are afraid of the guilt of omissions. (2.) They asked him to pray for them at this time, and on this occasion, but he promises to continue his prayers for them, as long as he lived. Our rule is, to pray without ceasing; we sin if we restrain prayer in general, and in particular if we cease

Their guilt did not consist in preferring the authority of kings to any other kind of government; but in rebelliously and ungratefully determining to be governed in a different manner, from that God Himself had chosen for them. And if, afterwards, when God had expressly appointed David to rule over them, the people had required a change of government, and wanted again to be ruled by judges as their fathers had been, they would have been guilty of a similar rebellion. Fear not, &c.] Samuel repeatedly exhorted the people to 'fear the Lord;' (14, 24.) yet here he exhorted them not to fear; that is, not to be dismayed by the dread of immediate destruction. (Note, Ex. 20: 18—20.)—Reverence of the majesty and authority of God, and fear of his displeasure, when counterpoised by the hope of his favor, quicken men in seeking and serving Him: but such a fear of wrath, as occasions despondency and hard thoughts of Him, drives men from their duty, and exposes them to manifold temptations. CHAP. XIII. While Samuel was joined in commission with Saul, things went well; (ch. 11: 7.) but now that Saul began to reign alone, all went to decay, and Samuel's words began to be fulfilled. Ye shall be consumed, both you and your king; for never was the state of Israel further gone in a consumption than in this ch. Saul appears here a very silly prince; infatuated in his councils; invaded by his neighbors; deserted by his soldiers; disordered in his own spirit, and sacrificing in confusion; chidden by Samuel; and rejected of God from being a king: and the people appear a very miserable people; disheartened and dispersed; diminished; plundered; disarmed. This they got by casting off God's government, and making themselves like the nations; all their glory departed from them.

V. 1—7. We are not told wherein Israel offended God, but doubtless they left God, else He had not left them, as here it appears He did; for,

I. Saul was very weak and impolitic, and did not order his affairs with discretion. Saul was the son of one year, so the original; a phrase which ordinarily signifies the date of one's birth: therefore some understand it figuratively, he was as innocent and good as a child of a year old; so the Chal. he was without fault, like the son of a year. But if we admit a figurative sense, it may as well intimate that he was ignorant and imprudent, and as unfit for business as a child of a year old: and the following particulars make that more his character, than the former. But we take it rather as our translation has it, Saul reigned one year, and nothing considerable happened; it was a year of no action; but in his second year he did as follows:

1. He chose him a band of 3000 men, two for himself and one for Jonathan, and dismissed the rest, (v. 2.) too many, if only to guard and attend him; too few, if for a standing army; and, perhaps, the confidence he put in this select number, and his disbanding the rest of that brave army with which he lately beat the Ammonites, (ch. 11: 8, 11.) was looked upon as an affront to the kingdom, gave a general disgust, and was the reason he had so few at his call when he had occasion for them. The prince that relies on a particular party, weakens his own interest in the whole community.

2. He ordered his son Jonathan to surprise and destroy the garrison of the Philistines near by in Geba, v. 3. treacherously, I suspect, because it is said, for doing it, Israel was had in abomination, with the Philistines, (v. 4.) as men void of common honesty, whose word could not be relied on. Nothing makes the name of Israel so odious to them that are without, as the fraud and dishonesty of those that are called by that worthy name. If professors of religion cheat and overreach, break their word, and betray their trust, religion suffers by it, and is had in abomination with the Philistines. Whom may one trust, if not an Israelite? one that, it is expected, should be without guile.

3. When he had thus exasperated the Philistines, then he began to raise forces, which, if he had acted wisely, he would have done before. Let the Hebrews hear; (v. 3.) and so, as many as thought fit came to Saul to Gilgal, v. 4. But the generality, we may suppose, drew back, either in dislike of his politics, or in dread of the Philistines, who, if he had summoned them sooner, would have been as ready at his beck, as they were when he marched against the Ammonites. We often find that after-wit would have done much better before, and have prevented much inconvenience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The favored few, who have walked before God from childhood to old age, while they look back on their past lives with gratitude, as the sure evidence of acceptance, and as confirming their expectation of eternal glory; may receive this satisfaction, and the 'rejoicing in the testimony of their consciences,' as a gracious recompense from the Lord; and may speak of them, in order to induce young persons to seek and serve Him without delay.—The honor, rendered to those who are concluding their course, differs widely from the applause and congratulation which many receive, when they first step forth before the public eye. This indeed often terminates in disgrace and contempt: it is therefore unworthy of our wishes, and ought surely never to move a wise man's envy or discontent, though rendered to others at his expense. (2 Sam. 15. 1—6. 18: 9—18. 1 Chr. 29: 20, 26—28.)—God's servants, though ill-treated, should be careful not to expostulate too much with those by whom they have been injured; but to 'reason with them of the righteous acts of the LORD,' of his truth and mercy, and of their conduct towards Him, for their humiliation.—Our safe and happy state consists in a willing dependence on God, and subjection to Him: but we are apt to affect independence, and to refuse obedience, by which we exchange substantial good for an empty shadow.—Disobedience ensures misery from generation to generation, whatever be our station or circumstances in life: and to continue 'following the LORD,' as his accepted servants, is the highest privilege we can enjoy.—The most useful benefactors of mankind, who have spent their lives, and worn out their constitutions, in unceasing labors for the good of others, must not be surprised, if they are at length cast off with neglect and ingratitude: but when the perverseness of their brethren prevents them from doing all that good which they desired to do, they should still do all the good they can. This is a general rule for all; and no provocations should tempt us to sin against God in ceasing to pray for our children, relations, friends, people, fellow sinners, or even our inveterate enemies. Yet the prayers of the church, and the intercession of Christ, will in the event appear to have been united against impenitent sinners; yea, the whole creation will shortly be armed against them. The belief of this should 'warn them to flee from the wrath to come,' to confess their sins, to obey the Gospel, and to desire the prayers and counsels of its ministers.—In the day of judgment all those things which men have inordinately loved, and for which they have forsaken God, will be found 'vain, and such as cannot profit or deliver,' even though they were 'the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them.' Happy then are they, whom the Lord has pleased to make his people! 'He will never leave nor forsake them,' but will glorify his great name in their eternal salvation. None, however, can know assuredly, that these blessings belong to them, except they attend to 'the good and the right way, and fear the LORD, and serve Him with all their heart:' (Notes, Jer. 32: 38—41. John 10 26—31. 1 Pet. 1: 3—5.) and if 'we consider what great things He hath done for us,' especially in the work of our redemption and regeneration, we cannot want motive, or encouragement, or assistance for so doing. SCOTT.

solemn declaration. Though ungratefully rejected by Israel, and degraded from his high station; he would yet think himself most criminal before God, should he decline any service, which he was in his inferior station capable of rendering them. This entirely coincides with Paul's avowal to the Corinthians. (2 Cor 12: 14, 15.)

Verses 3, 4.

After Saul had defeated Nahash, and had been confirmed in the Philistines heard of it: and Saul [e]blew the trumpet throughout all the land, saying, Let the Hebrews hear.

4 And all Israel heard say that Saul had smitten a garrison of the Philistines, and that Israel also [*]was had in abomination with the Philistines. And the people were called together after Saul [f]to Gilgal.

5 And the Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel, thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and people [g]as the sand which is on the sea-shore in multitude: and they came up, and pitched in Michmash, eastward from [h]Beth-aven.

6 When the men of Israel saw that they were [i]in a strait, (for the people were distressed,) then the people did hide themselves [k]in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits.

7 And some of [l]the Hebrews went over Jordan to the land of [m]Gad and Gilead: as for Saul, he was yet in Gilgal, and all the people [†]followed him trembling.

8 And he [n]tarried seven days according to the set time that Samuel had appointed: but Samuel came not to Gilgal, and the people were scattered from him.

9 And Saul said, Bring hither a burnt-offering to me, and peace-offerings. And [o]he offered the burnt-offering.

II. Never did the Philistines appear in such a formidable body as now; we may suppose they had great assistance from their allies; (v. 5.) horses, in those times, were not so much used in war as they now are, and here was a great body, the number of chariots, also, was incredible: most of them, we may suppose, carriages for baggage, not chariots of war. Their foot was innumerable as the sand of the sea-shore; so jealous were they for the honor of their nation, and so much enraged at the baseness of the Israelites in destroying their garrison. Had Saul asked counsel of God before he had thus provoked the Philistines, he and his people might the better have borne this threatening trouble. But they had brought it on themselves by their own folly.

III. Never were the Israelites so faint-hearted, so very cowardly, as now. Many, it may be, came to Saul to Gilgal, but, hearing of the Philistines' numbers and preparations, their spirits sunk; some think, because they did not find Samuel there with Saul. They that, awhile ago, were weary of him, and wished for a king, now had small joy of their king, unless they could see him under Samuel's direction. Sooner or later, men will be made to see that God and his prophets are their best friends. 1. Some absconded, v. 6. See what work sin makes; it exposes men to perils, and then dispirits them. A single person, by faith, can say, I will not be afraid of ten thousand; but here, thousands of degenerate Israelites trembled at the approach of these Philistines. Guilt makes men cowards. 2. Others fled, v. 7. went over Jordan to Gilead, as far as they could from the danger, where they had lately been victorious over the Ammonites: where they had triumphed, they hoped to be sheltered. 3. Those that stayed with Saul, followed him trembling, expecting no other than to be cut off, and having their hands and hearts weakened by the desertion of so many of their troops. And, perhaps, Saul himself, though he in honor stood his ground, yet had no courage to spare, wherewith to inspire his trembling soldiers.

V. 8—14. Here is, I. Saul's offence in offering sacrifice before Samuel came. See ch. 10: 8. It is plain he understood he was to stay till Samuel came, else he would not have made so many excuses as he did, for not staying, v. 11. But he had not patience to wait till the end of the seventh day; perhaps, he began to reproach Samuel as false to his word, careless of his country, and disrespectful to his prince; and thought it more fit Samuel should wait for him, than he for Samuel: so he offered sacrifice; as if, because he was a king, though he was neither priest nor prophet, he might do any thing; a piece of presumption, king Uzziah paid dear for, 2 Chron. 26: 16, &c. Samuel had promised to show him what he should do, but he determined to engage the Philistines without Samuel's directions. So self-sufficient was Saul, that he thought it not worth while to stay for a prophet of the Lord, either to pray for him, or advise him.

This was Saul's offence, and what aggravated it, was, 1. He did not send any messenger to Samuel, to know his mind, though he had enough about him that were swift of foot. 2. When Samuel came, he rather boasted of what he had done, and seemed pleased with the opportunity of letting Samuel know that he could do well enough without him. He went out to bless him, so the word is, as if he now thought himself a complete priest, empowered to bless as well as sacrifice, whereas he should have gone out to be blessed by him. 3. He charged Samuel with breach of promise, (v. 11.) therefore if any thing was amiss, Samuel must bear the blame; whereas Samuel did come according to his word, before the seven days were expired. Thus the scoffers of the latter days think the promise of Christ's coming is broken, because He does not come in their time, though it is certain He will come at the set time. 4. When charged with disobedience, he justified himself in what he had done, and gave no sign at all of repentance for it. It is not sinning that ruins men, but sinning and not repenting; falling and not getting up again. See what excuses he made, v. 11, 12. He would have this act of disobedience pass, (1.) For an instance of his prudence; the people were most of them scattered from him, and he had no other way, to keep those with him, and to prevent their deserting too. If Samuel neglected the public concerns, he would not. (2.) For an instance of his piety; he would be thought very devout, and in great care not to engage the Philistines till he had by prayer and sacrifice engaged God on his side. Thus he covered his disobedience to God's command, with a pretence of concern for God's favor. Hypocrites lay great stress on the external performances of religion, thinking thereby to excuse their neglect of the weightier matters of the law. And yet, lastly, he owns it went against his conscience to do it; I forced myself, and offered a burnt-offering; perhaps boasting he had broken through his convictions, and got the better of them; or, at least, thinking this extenuated his fault, that he knew he should not have done as he did, but did it with reluctancy. Foolish man! to think God would be well pleased with sacrifices offered in direct opposition both to his general and particular command.

II. The sentence passed on Saul for this offence: Samuel found him standing by his burnt-offering; but, instead of an answer of peace, he let him know the sacrifice of the wicked is abomination to the Lord, much more when he brings it, as Saul did, with a wicked mind. 1. He shows him the aggravations of his crime; and says to this king, Thou art wicked; which it is not for any but a prophet of the Lord to say, Job 34: 18. He charges him with being an enemy to himself and his interest. Thou hast done foolishly; and rebelled against God and his government, 'Thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God, that command wherewith He intended to try thy obedience.' Note, Those that disobey the command-kingdom, and after he had joined with Samuel in offering sacrifices, and had obtained the benefit of his prayers; it must be concluded that he ought to have marched directly with his victorious army against the Philistines, who possessed strong-holds in the land, and had become very formidable; and that true policy required this of him. (9: 16. 11: 12—15.) But it is probable, that he was elated with success, pleased with the show of royalty, and disposed to ease and indulgence. Thus the favorable opportunity was lost, the ardor of his followers was suffered to abate, and perhaps some of them were disgusted: and the Philistines, doubtless learning that a king had been chosen, with a view to deliver Israel from their power; assiduously employed the time given them, in preparing for war, and in weakening and disarming the Israelites. presuming on his kingly authority, usurped the priesthood also: but this is doubtful. It is certain, however, that he took too much upon him. SCOTT.

Verses 13—15.

This commandment of the Lord by Samuel, was probably intended as a test of Saul's disposition: and his transgression proved, that he did not regard the word of God, when it greatly interfered with his own inclinations or sentiments; by which it appeared that he was unfit to rule, as the vicegerent of the Lord over his people. He was 'weighed in this balance, and found wanting.' Had he behaved properly, the kingdom would have been permanently confirmed in his family; and it is probable Samuel came to Gilgal, expecting to make this settlement of the kingdom by divine authority: but now, Saul was sentenced to be removed, to make way for one of a more obedient disposition. This the omniscient God foresaw: but his secret purpose was not the motive of Saul's conduct; which to the Searcher of hearts doubtless appeared much more aggravated than it does to us. (Notes, Gen. 2: 16, 17. 3: 6.)—Samuel on this occasion departed from Saul; yet, as he went to Gibeah of Saul, and not to Ramah, and as he came to him afterwards, (15: 1, 13, 34, 35.) it is conjectured that the sentence was not irreversible; but that, if Saul had repented of this sin, and been more obedient in future, he might notwithstanding have been continued in the kingdom. CHAP. XIV.

Jonathan, attended only by his armor-bearer, smites the garrison of the Philistines, 1—14. who are seized with terror, and destroy one another, 15, 16. Saul, seeing the tumult, inquires of God: but without waiting for an answer, he assaults the Philistines; being joined by the Hebrews who had deserted or hid themselves, 17—23. His rash course, against such as ate that day, hinders the completion of the victory; and Jonathan, not knowing what had passed, violates it, 24—30. The people fly upon the spoil, and are hardly restrained from eating with the blood, 31—34. Saul builds an altar; and asks counsel of God, but is not answered, 35—37. Jonathan, taken by lot and sentenced to die, is rescued by the people, 38—46. Saul's victories and family, 47—52.

SHOPS, transplanted the smiths into their own country, and forbade any Israelite, under severe penalties, to work in brass or iron, though they had rich mines of both, (Deut. 8: 9.) in such plenty, that it was said of Asher, His shoes shall be iron and brass; they must go to them, i. e. to some or other of their garrisons, dispersed in the country, to have all their iron work done, and no more might an Israelite do than use a file; (v. 20, 21.) and no doubt the Philistines' smiths brought the Israelites long bills for work done. For Saul, that pretended to be a king, like the kings of the nations, it was very impolitic not to redress this grievance, and arm his people from the Ammonites' spoil, and could by no means be excused. How slothful and mean-spirited were the Israelites, that suffered this. Surely they were reduced to it, or began to be so, in Samson's time, for we never find him with a sword or spear in his hand. Had they not been dispirited, they could not have been disarmed, but sin made them naked to their shame.

CHAP. XIV. We left Israel in a very ill posture, in the close of the foregoing chapter; yet here we find a happy turn, that still Samuel's words 12: 22. may be made good.

V. 1—15. We must here notice, I. God's goodness in restraining the Philistines, a vast army of stout men, from falling upon that little handful of timorous people Saul had with him. An invisible power sets bounds to the malice of the church's enemies.

II. Saul's weakness, who seems here to have been quite at a loss, and unable to help himself.

1. He durst not stay at Gibeah, but got into some obscure place, in the uttermost part of the city, and pitched his tent under a pomegranate tree, (v. 2.) under Rimmon, so the word is, Ha-Rimmon, that Rimmon near Gibeah, in the caves of which those 600 Benjamites that escaped, hid themselves, Judg. 20: 47. Some think he took shelter there from meanness of spirit, now that he was fallen under God's displeasure, every hour expecting the Philistines upon him, and, thereby, the accomplishment of Samuel's threatening, ch. 13: 14. Those can never think themselves safe, that see themselves cast out of God's protection.

2. Now he sent for a priest from Shiloh, and the ark from Kirjath-jearim, v. 3, 18. He had once offended by offering sacrifice himself; (ch 13: 9.) now he resolves never to fall into that error again, and hopes to compromise the matter with God by a partial reformation, as many do, whose hearts are unhumbled and unchanged. Ahiah will not make him stay for him, nor reprove him, as Samuel had done, but will do just as he bids him, v. 18, 19. Many love to have just such ministers as will be what they would have them to be, and prophesy smooth things to them; and by caressing them because they are priests, they hope to atone for their enmity to those ministers that deal faithfully and plainly with them. He will also have the ark brought, in hopes that would make up the deficiency of his forces. It is common for those that have lost the substance of religion, to be most fond of the shadows of it, as here a deserted prince courts a deserted priest.

III. Jonathan's bravery and piety, who was much fitter than his father to wear the crown. A sweet imp, (says Bp. Hall) out of a crab stock.

1. He resolved to go unknown into the camp of the Philistines; he did not acquaint his father, for he knew he would forbid him; nor the people, for he knew they would all discourage him, v. 1, 3. Nor had he so great an opinion of the priest, as to consult him, but, being conscious of a divine impulse putting him on it, he threw himself into the mouth of danger, in hopes of doing service to his country. The way to the enemies' camp is described (v. 4, 5.) as peculiarly difficult, and their natural intrenchments seemed impregnable; yet that only hardens and whets his resolution. Great and generous souls are animated by opposition, and take pleasure in breaking through it.

2. He encouraged his armor-bearer to go with him, v. 6. 'They are uncircumcised,' said he, 'and have not the seal of the covenant in their flesh, as we have.' If such as are enemies to us, are also strangers to God, we need not fear them. 'There is no restraint to the Lord, to save by many or by few;' a truth easily granted in general, and yet not so easily put in practice in a difficult case. However, he proceeded: 'Who knows, but He that can use us for his glory, will do it? It may be the Lord will work for us, work with us, work a sign or miracle for us;' so the Chaldee. Perhaps he thought of Deut. 32: 30. An active faith will venture far in God's cause on an, It may be.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When men are lifted up in self-sufficiency, they are often left to the most unaccountable infatuation.—The chief advantages of the enemies of the church are derived from the misconduct of its professed friends. Yet, while sinners are meditating revenge, the Lord often restrains their malice by invisible hindrances, and uses their machinations for the chastisement of his people.—Our observance of the Lord's directions, will always be proportioned to our simplicity of dependence on his promises, and submission to his will: and those who are most dilatory in doing their duty, are commonly the most impatient of delay in waiting his time of deliverance.—Our disposition to obey or disobey will often be decisively proved by our behavior in apparently small things: (Note, Gen. 3: 6.) and such as most neglect the duties of their own station, are most forward to censure the supposed negligence of others. We have, by sin, forfeited felicity; but unbelief and impenitence ratify that forfeiture: and those who have undeniably broken the commandments of God, and yet persist in excusing and justifying themselves, are evidently both impenitent and unbelieving. The trouble of all such as continue in this spirit, must certainly increase; and as they refuse to submit to God, they must be reduced to misery in the slavery of sin. But, while the Lord 'pours contempt upon princes, and brings to nought all the honorable of the earth,' He will deliver his people by his own power: and while He shames such as trust in man, and aspire to greatness and pre-eminence in outward things; He will honor those who humbly and in faith expect help from Him alone. SCOTT.

Verse 23.

It is supposed, that between Michmash and Gibeah, each situated on a hill, there was a valley, called 'the passage of Michmash;' into which the garrison of the Philistines 'went out,' either to challenge the Israelites to battle, or in order to make an assault upon Gibeah. (15, 16. 14: 4, 5.) SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 2, 3. (13: 15, 16. Note, 22.) Ahiah, or Ahimelech, was greatgrandson of Eli, the LORD'S priest in Shiloh. Ahitub was the elder brother of I-chabod; (Note, 4: 19—22.) and his son was at this time high priest, and so wore the ephod, and the breast-plate of judgment, with Urim and Thummim. (M. R.—Notes, Ex. 28: 30.) SCOTT.

(2.) Pomegranate tree.] 'Rimmon might be the name of a place, see Josh. 15: 32. If we likewise recollect, that the pomegranate tree is of a low growth, and consequently very improper to have a tent pitched under it, the rendering the word by a proper name will clear the passage from an objection which might otherwise be urged against it.' Sir T. BROWN. in Hewlet'.

Verse 5.

Fore-front.] 'Heb. tooth; i. e. the one pointed N. and the other S.' WILLIAMS.

6 And Jonathan said to the young man that bare his armor, Come, and let us go over unto the garrison of these [h] uncircumcised: [i] it may be that the LORD will work for us; [j] for there is no restraint to the LORD, to save by many or by few.

7 And his armor-bearer said unto him, [k] Do all that is in thine heart: turn thee; behold, I am with thee according to thy heart.

8 Then said Jonathan, Behold, [l] we will pass over unto these men, and we will discover ourselves unto them.

9 If [m] they say thus unto us, * Tarry until we come to you; then we will stand still in our place, and will not go up unto them.

10 But if they say thus, Come up unto us; then we will go up: for the LORD hath delivered them into our hand: and [n] this shall be a sign unto us.

11 And both of them discovered themselves unto the garrison of the Philistines: and the Philistines said, Behold, the Hebrews come forth [o] out of the holes, where they had hid themselves.

12 And the men of the garrison answered Jonathan and his armor-bearer, and said, [p] Come up to us, and we will show you a thing. And Jonathan said unto his armor-bearer, [q] Come up after me, for the LORD hath delivered them into the hand of Israel.

13 And Jonathan [r] climbed up upon his hands and upon his feet, and his armor-bearer after him: and they [s] fell before Jonathan; and his armor-bearer slew after him.

14 And that first slaughter, which Jonathan and his armor-bearer made, was about twenty men, within as it were † an half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough.

15 And [t] there was trembling in the host, in the field, and among all the people; the garrison, and [u] the spoilers, they also trembled; and [x] the earth quaked: so it was a ‡ very great trembling.

16 ¶ And the watchmen of Saul in Gibeah of Benjamin looked: and behold the multitude [y] melted away, and they went on [z] beating down one another.

17 Then said Saul

ed to carry, not Jonathan's arms only, but his heart, promised to stand by him, wheresoever he went, v. 7.

3. How bold soever his resolution, he resolved to follow Providence in the execution of it, and to be determined by that. 'Come,' (says he to his confidant,) 'we will discover ourselves to the enemy, as those that are not afraid, (v. 8.) and then, if they bid us stand, we will take that for an intimation of Providence, that God would have us act defensively, and prepare, as well as we can, to give them a warm reception: (v. 9.) but if they challenge us, and the first sentinel we meet with bids us march on, we will push forward, and make as brisk an onset, assuredly gathering thence that God would have us act offensively, and then, not doubting but He will stand by us;' (v. 10.) and upon this issue he puts it, firmly believing, as we all should, that God governs the hearts and tongues of all men, even of those that have no regard to Him, and serves his own purposes by them, though they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so. God will, some way or other, direct the steps of those that acknowledge him in all their ways, and seek unto Him for direction, with full purpose of heart to follow his conduct. Sometimes we find most comfort in that which is least our own doing, and into which we have been led by the unexpected, but well observed, turns of Providence.

Providence gave him the sign he expected, v. 11. The guards of the Philistines disdained them, as a regiment of the sneakers. If some of Christ's soldiers play the coward, others that play the man may, perhaps, be upbraided with it. They defied them; (v. 12.) Come, and we will show you a thing; meaning, as Goliath, (ch. 17: 44.) that they would give them as meat to the fowls of the air. They bantered them, not doubting to make a prey of them. This greatly emboldened Jonathan. With it he encouraged his servant; he had spoken with uncertainty, (v. 6.) but now with assurance; (v. 12.) The Lord has delivered them, not into our hand, (he sought not his own glory,) but into the hand of Israel; for he aimed at nothing but the advantage of the public.

4. His wonderful success. The Philistines unaccountably fell; i. e. many were slain; (v. 14.) 20 fell presently. It was not so much the name of Jonathan, that made them yield so tamely, though some think he was become terrible to them, since he smote one of their garrisons, (ch. 13: 3.) but it was God's right hand, and his arm, that got him this victory.

The rest were put to flight, and fell foul upon one another, v. 15. It is called a trembling of God, so the original, signifying, not only, as we render it, a very great trembling which they could not resist, nor reason themselves clear of, but that it was supernatural, immediately from God. He that made the heart, knows how to make it tremble. To complete the confusion, even the earth quaked. Those that will not fear the eternal God, He can make afraid of a shadow. See Prov. 28: 1. Isa. 33: 14.

V. 16—23. The Philistines were, by the power of God, set against one another, v. 16, 20. They were very secure, for all the swords and spears were in their hands, except what Saul and Jonathan had; but now God showed them the folly of that confidence, by making their own swords and spears the instruments of their destruction, and more fatal in their own hands, than if in the hands of Israel. See the like done, Judg. 7: 22. 2 Chron. 20: 23.

1. Those that stood sentinel at Gibeah, (v. 16.) were aware the enemy was in great confusion, and a great slaughter made among them, yet, on search, they found only Jonathan and his servant absent, (v. 17.) which, no doubt, greatly animated them, and assured them it could be no other than the Lord's doing, when there was no more of man's doing, than those two could do against a great host.

2. Saul began to inquire of God, but soon desisted. He was not humbled enough to consult

Because now he thought he did not need an answer, the case was plain enough. And yet the more evident it was that God did all, the more reason he had to inquire, whether He would give him leave to do any thing. Or, (2.) Because now he would not stay for it; he was in such haste to fight a falling enemy. A little thing will divert a vain and carnal mind from religious exercises. He that believeth will not make such haste as this, nor reckon any business so urgent, as not to allow time to take God along with him.

3. He, and all the little force he had, made a vigorous attack on the enemy: and all the people were cried together, so the word is; v. 20. for want of the silver trumpets, Numb. 10: 9. they summoned them together by shouting, and now they seem bold and brave, when the work is done to their hands. Our Lord Jesus has conquered our spiritual enemies, routed and dispersed them, so that we are cowards indeed, if we will not stand to our arms, when it is only to pursue the victory and divide the spoil.

4. Every Hebrew now turned his hand against the Philistines. 1. Those that had deserted to the enemy, now fought against them; v. 21. some think, they were such as had been taken prisoners by them: it rather seems, they went in to them voluntarily. 2. Those that had run their colors, and hid themselves in the mountains, returned to their posts, and joined the pursuers, v. 22. hoping thus to atone for their former cowardice. It was not much to their praise to appear now, but it would have been more to their reproach had they not appeared.

23 So [g] the LORD saved Israel that day: and the battle passed over unto [h] Beth-aven.

[Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ And the men of Israel were distressed that day: for Saul had adjured the people, saying, [i] Cursed be the man that eateth any food until evening, that [k] I may be avenged on mine enemies. So none of the people tasted any food.

25 And [l] all they of the land came to a wood; and there was [m] honey upon the ground.

26 And when the people were come into the wood, behold the honey dropped: but no man put his hand to his mouth; for [n] the people feared the oath.

Thus all hands were at work against the Philistines, and every Israelite slew as many as he could, without sword or spear; yet it is said, v. 23. it was the Lord that saved Israel that day. He did it by them, for without Him they could do nothing. Salvation is of the Lord.

V. 24—35. We have here an account of the distress of Israel, even in the days of their triumphs.

I. Saul forbade the people, under the penalty of a curse, to taste any food that day, v. 24. And suppose he did it with a good intention, lest the people, who perhaps had been kept short for some time, when they found plenty of victuals in the deserted camp of the Philistines, should fall greedily upon that, and so lose time in pursuing the enemy, and some of them, it may be, glut themselves so, as not to be fit for any more service that day; yet his making this severe order was very impolitic, and very unwise; for if it gained time, it lost strength for the pursuit. It was imperious, and disobliging, worse than muzzling the mouth of the ox, when he treads out the corn. To forbid them to feast had been commendable, but to forbid them so much as to taste, though so hungry, was barbarous. It was impious, to enforce the prohibition with a curse and an oath. Had he no penalty less than an anathema, wherewith to support his military discipline? Though superiors may chide and correct, they may not curse their inferiors; our rule is, Bless, and curse not. When David speaks of an enemy he had that loved cursing, perhaps he meant Saul, Ps. 109: 17, 18.

II. The people observed his order, but it had many inconveniences attending it. Yet, for fear of the curse, they did not so much as taste the honey, v. 25, 26. Those are worthy the name of Israelites, that can deny themselves, even when the temptation is strongest. Let us never feed ourselves, much less feast ourselves, without fear. Jonathan fell under the curse. It was through ignorance, and therefore he might justly be looked upon as exempted from the charge, and not intended in it. But it seems it was taken for granted, and he himself did not object, though absent on so good

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23. Hypocrites often expose their indifference, even about the religion which they professedly choose; for as it has no practical energy upon them, a small matter induces them to dispense with the useless form.—Yet, blessed be God, every age also produces illustrious instances of those, who being strong in faith give glory to God; and its triumphs are proportioned to its strength.—While we are obeying the commands of God, trusting his protection, and seeking his glory, neither the sense of our own weakness, nor the power of our enemies should dismay us; 'for there is no restraint to the LORD to save by many or by few.' We are not indeed warranted at present to expect miraculous interpositions: yet the feeblest instrument, who sincerely and in faith uses the appointed means, in order to subvert Satan's kingdom of ignorance, error, and wickedness, is authorized to expect considerable success; for 'it may be that the LORD will work with him:' and then the weapons of his warfare will prove mighty, and no force of the enemies of our God and his Christ can stand before him. (M. R. i. Note, Lev. 27: 28, 29.) It was the more inexcusable, in that he did not say, 'that the LORD may avenge Israel on his enemies,' but 'that I may be avenged on mine enemies.'—Jonathan had reason to complain, that his 'father had troubled the land,' (1 Kings 18: 17—20.) as his conduct in every way obstructed the complete success of Israel. SCOTT.

(25.) Honey.] 'This was not the honey of bees, found in the fissures of rocks; nor was it the liquid manna, called terengabin, although this manna was formerly comprehended under the common word for honey. 27 But Jonathan heard not when his father charged the people with the oath: wherefore he put forth the end of the rod that was in his hand, and dipped it in an honeycomb, and put his hand to his mouth; and [o] his eyes were enlightened.

28 Then answered one of the people, and said, Thy father straitly charged the people with an oath, saying, [p] Cursed be the man that eateth any food this day. And the people were * faint.

29 Then said Jonathan, [q] My father hath troubled the land: see, I pray you, how mine eyes have been enlightened, because I tasted a little of this honey.

30 How much more, if haply the people had eaten freely to-day of the spoil of their enemies which they found? for [r] had there not been now a much greater slaughter among the Philistines?

31 And they smote the Philistines that day from Michmash to [s] Aijalon: and the people were very faint.

32 And the people [t] flew upon the spoil, and took sheep, and oxen, and calves, and slew them on the ground: and the people [u] did eat them with the blood.

33 Then they told Saul, saying, Behold, the people sin against the LORD, in that they eat with the blood. And he said, Ye have † transgressed: roll a great stone unto me this day.

34 And Saul said, Disperse yourselves among the people, and say unto them, Bring me hither every man his ox, and every man his sheep, and slay them here, and eat; and sin not against the LORD in eating with the blood. And all the people brought every man his ox ‡ with him that night, and slew them there.

35 And Saul [v] built an altar unto the LORD: § the same was the first altar that he built unto the LORD.

36 ¶ And Saul said, [x] Let us go down after the Philistines by night, and spoil them until the morning-light, and [y] let us not leave a man of them. And they said, Do whatsoever seemeth good unto thee. Then [z] said the priest, Let us draw near hither unto God.

37 And Saul asked counsel of God, [a] Shall I go down after the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into the hand of Israel? But [b] he answered him not that day.

38 And Saul said, [c] Draw ye near hither all the ‖ chief of the people: and know and see wherein this sin hath been this day.

39 For as [d] the LORD liveth, which saveth Israel, though it be in Jonathan my son, he shall surely die. But there was not a man among all the people that answered him.

aside from God, yet now he begins to build altars, being most zealous (as many are) for the form of godliness, when he was denying the power of it. See Hos. 8: 14. Israel has forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples. Some read it, He began to build that altar; he laid the first stone, but was so hasty to pursue his victory, that he could not stay to finish it.

V. 36—46. Here is, I. Saul's boasting against the Philistines, v. 36. in which was much zeal, but little discretion; for his army, thus fatigued, could as ill spare a night's sleep, as a meal's meat. But it is common for rash and foolish men, to consider no body but themselves, and, so they may but have their humor, not to care what hardships they put upon those under them. However, his people were so obsequious, they would by no means oppose the motion. Do whatsoever seemeth good to thee. Only the priest thought it convenient to go on with the devotions that were broken off abruptly, (v. 19.) and to consult the oracle, Let us draw hither unto God. Princes and great men have need of such about them, as will thus be their remembrancers, wherever they go, to take God along with them. And when the priest proposed it, Saul could not, for shame, reject the motion, v. 37.

II. His falling foul on his son Jonathan: and the rest of this paragraph is wholly concerning him; for while he is prosecuted, the Philistines made their escape. We know not what mischief may ensue on one rash resolve.

1. God, by giving an intimation of his displeasure, put Saul upon searching for an accursed thing. When, by the priest, he consulted the oracle, God answered him not, v. 37. Note, When God denies our prayers, it concerns us to inquire what the sin is that has provoked him to do so, (v. 38.) for God's ear is not heavy that it cannot hear, but sin separates between us and Him. Saul swears by his Maker, whoever was the Achan he should certainly die, though it were Jonathan himself; i. e. ever so dear, little thinking Jonathan was the man, v. 39. But none of the people answered him; i. e. none would inform against Jonathan.

Verses 36—44.

(M. R. x—b.) If Saul had been humbly sensible of the evil of his own past conduct, he would have concluded himself to be the culprit. (28: 6. Ez. 14: 1—5. 20: 1—3.) The Lord, however, was pleased, that the conduct of Jonathan should be discovered, as the cause why he did not answer the high-priest's inquiries: that the people might understand how much they were interested in the conduct of their king; and be convinced of their folly in rejecting the government of a pious prophet, whose prayers brought down blessings, for that of a king, whose curses brought down wrath upon them. (7: 8:) SCOTT.

Verses 37—45.

'The sacred lot, called Urim and Thummim, was employed in a particular manner for judicial purposes. It was used likewise in criminal trials, though only to discover, not to convict, as here Jonathan's confession is annexed. and Jonathan were taken: but the people * escaped.

42 And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan my son. And Jonathan was taken.

43 Then Saul said to Jonathan, [g] Tell me what thou hast done. And Jonathan told him, and said, [h] I did but taste a little honey with the end of the rod that was in mine hand, and, lo, I must die.

44 And Saul answered, [i] God do so, and more also: for [k] thou shalt surely die, Jonathan.

45 And the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, [l] who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the LORD liveth, [m] there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for [n] he hath wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not.

46 Then Saul went up from following the Philistines: and the Philistines went to their own place.

47 ¶ So Saul [o] took the kingdom over Israel, and [p] fought against all his enemies on every side, against Moab, and against the children of [q] Ammon, and against Edom, and against the kings of [r] Zobah, and against the Philistines, and whithersoever he turned himself he vexed them

2. Jonathan was discovered by lot to be the offender. Saul would have cast lots between himself and Jonathan on the one side, and the people on the other, perhaps, because he was as confident of Jonathan's innocency, as of his own, v. 40. The people acquiesce. 'Do as seemeth good unto thee.' But first he prayed that God would give a perfect lot; (v. 41.) i. e. make a full discovery; or, as in the margin, show the innocent. This was with an air of impartial justice. Judges should desire the truth may come out, whoever may suffer by it. Lots should be cast with prayer, because they are a solemn appeal to Providence, and by them we beg of God to direct and determine us; (Acts 1: 24.) for which reason some have condemned games, that depend purely upon lot or chance, as making too bold with a sacred thing. Jonathan at length was taken; (v. 42.) Providence designing hereby to support lawful authority, and to honor the administration of public justice in general, reserving another way to bring off one that had done nothing worthy of death.

3. Jonathan ingenuously confesses the fact, and Saul, with an angry curse, passes sentence on him. Jonathan thinks it hard he must die for it, v. 43. He might have pleaded his ignorance of the law, or have insisted on his merit, but he submitted to the necessity with a great and generous mind, 'God's and my father's will be done.' It is as brave to yield in some cases, as it is in other cases to fight. Saul is not mollified by his filial submission, nor the hardness of his case; but, as one that affected to be thought firm to his word, and much more to his oath, even then when it bound him hardest, with another imprecation gives judgment upon Jonathan, v. 44. But he passed sentence too hastily, without consulting the oracle; Jonathan had a very good plea in arrest of the judgment; what he had done was not bad in itself; and he, being ignorant of the prohibition, could not be charged with rebellion or disobedience. Had Jonathan been worthy to die, yet it had become a judge, much more a father, to pass sentence with tenderness and compassion, and not with such an air of triumph, and in fury, like a man perfectly divested of all humanity and natural affection. Justice is debased, when administered with wrath and bitterness. He backed it with a curse on himself, if he did not see the sentence executed; and this curse did return on his own head; Jonathan escaped, but God did so to Saul, and more also; for he was rejected of God, and made an anathema. Let none on any occasion dare use such imprecations as these, lest God say Amen to them, and make their own tongues to fall upon them. Yet we have reason to think Saul's bowels yearned toward Jonathan, [and if so, it was a noble act in some respects,] so that he really punished himself, and very justly, when he seemed so severe on Jonathan. God made him feel the smart of his own rash edict, which might make him fear being again guilty of the like. By all these vexatious accidents, God did likewise correct him for his presumption, in offering sacrifice without Samuel. An expedition so ill begun, could not end without some rebukes.

4. The people rescued Jonathan, v. 45. Hitherto they had expressed themselves very observant of Saul, (v. 36, 40.) but when Jonathan is in danger, Saul's word is no longer law, but with the utmost zeal they oppose the execution of his sentence; 'Shall Jonathan die? That blessing, that darling, of his country? Shall that life be sacrificed to a punctilio of law and honor, which was so bravely exposed for the public service, and to which we owe our lives and triumphs? No, we will never stand by, and see him thus treated, whom God delights to honor.' It is good to see Israelites zealous for the protection of those whom

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24—52. In the midst of the most glorious success, 'one sinner' often 'destroyeth much good:' and rash zeal is as hurtful as timid inaction.—There is neither prudence nor piety in restraining men from partaking of the bounty of God's providence, when it is so used as to prepare them for his service, and encourage rather than hinder them in it. They are indeed 'troublers of Israel,' who prohibit such use of those good things which 'God giveth us richly to enjoy:' the curses, with which they sanction their antichristian mandates, will fall on their own heads; and they will be answerable for all the consequences: for restraints from things lawful generally prove temptations to forbidden indulgences, and a superstitious zeal about externals has often hindered men from performing essential services to the church. (1 Tim. 4: 1—5.)—An unhumbled heart suspects every other person, and looks every where but to himself, for the sinful cause of calamity!—Those who are indulgent to their own sins, are generally severe in animadverting on the faults of others: and such as most disregard God's authority, are most impatient when their own commands appear to be slighted, or their reputation eclipsed.—Those who delight in cursing, are in extreme danger of falling under the awful curse of God: (Ps. 109: 6—20.) and the habit of swearing will certainly involve a man in the guilt of perjury, as well as of profaneness; for though now concealed, his iniquity will be 'sure to find him out.'—No oath can bind us to commit injustice: but the rash swearer should repent of his iniquity, and not add one crime to another. In the midst of mercy the Lord will rebuke his people for their sins; and by mismanagement men lose the comfort of their successes, and are discontented, and filled with vexation, in the midst of blessings.—But the Lord employs even wicked men as instruments of providential good to his people: in temporal prosperity they forget their sins, and the threatened wrath of God: and thus they blaze for a moment, like a meteor, and then are put out in utter darkness. O Lord, let us rather be chastened here, than thus prosper and be condemned with the world! SCOTT.

Verses 47—52.

After the decided victory over the Philistines, Saul's authority as king was re-established: and though the Lord was displeased with him, and purposed to set aside his family; yet He prospered him in the wars which he carried on against the several nations which oppressed Israel.—It is evident that many important transactions of his reign are passed over in silence; and that in general it was more active and successful, (in the former part of it especially,) than it appears at first sight to have been. But, to the end of his life, Saul was unable to prevail against the Philistines, having missed the opportunity which God had afforded him: so that, after having had sore war with him all his days, the three sons here mentioned fell at last by their hands, and he was driven to murder himself. Saul is sent to destroy Amalek, 1—3. He gathers a large army, favors the Kenites, and smites the Amalekites, 4—7. He spares Agag and the best of the spoil, 8, 9. Samuel is sent to declare unto him, that God has rejected him for his disobedience; and Saul in vain attempts to excuse himself, 10—21. He is convicted of rebellion; and partially humbles himself, but cannot get the sentence reversed, 22—31. Samuel kills Agag, and finally leaves Saul, 32—35.

SAMUEL also said unto Saul, [a] The LORD sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now therefore [b] hearken thou unto the voice of the words of the LORD.

God has made instruments of public good. They oppose their oath to Saul's: they did not rescue him by violence, but by reason and resolution; and Josephus says, they made their prayer to God, that he might be loosed from the curse. They plead for him, that he has wrought with God this day; i. e. 'he has owned God's cause, and God has owned his endeavors, therefore his life is too precious to be thrown away upon a nicety.' We may suppose, Saul had not so perfectly forgotten the relation of a father, but that he was willing enough to have Jonathan rescued, and well pleased to have that done, which yet he would not do himself: and he that knows the heart of a father, knows not how to blame him.

Lastly, The design against the Philistines is quashed by this incident; (v. 46.) and so an opportunity was lost of completing the victory. When Israel's shields are clashing together, the public safety and service suffer by it.

V. 47—52. Here is a general account of Saul's court and camp.

1. Of his court. The names of his sons and daughters, v. 49. and of his wife, and his cousin-german that was general of his army, v. 50. There is mention of another wife of Saul's, 2 Sam. 21: 8. Rizpah, a secondary wife, and of the children he had by her.

2. Of his camp. When he saw any strong, valiant man, remarkably fit for service, he took him unto him, v. 52. as Samuel had told them the manner of the king would be; (ch. 8: 11.) and if he must have a standing army, it was his prudence to fill it up with the ablest. With this army he guarded his country against the insults of its enemies on every side, and prevented their incursions, v. 47, 48. It is supposed he acted only defensively against those that used to invade the borders of Israel, and whithersoever he turned himself, as there was occasion, he vexed them, by checking and disappointing them. He struggled most with the Philistines, with them he had sore war all his days, v. 52. He had little reason to be proud of his royal dignity, nor had any of his neighbors cause to envy him, for he had little enjoyment of himself after he took the kingdom. He could not vex his enemies without some vexation to himself, such thorns are crowns quilted with.

CHAP. XV. In this ch. we have the final rejection of Saul from being king, for his disobedience to God's command, in not utterly destroying the Amalekites. By his wars and victories, he hoped to magnify and perpetuate his own name and honor; but, by his mismanagement of them, he ruined himself, and laid his honor in the dust.

V. 1—9. Here, I. Samuel, in God's name, solemnly requires Saul to obey the command of God, and plainly intimates he was now about to put him on a trial, in one particular instance, whether he would be obedient or no, v. 1. This very much aggravated his disobedience. He reminds him of what God had done for him, and tells him, in general, that, in consideration of this, whatever God commanded him to do, he was bound to do it. Now therefore hearken to the voice of the Lord. Note, God's favors to us lay strong obligations on us, to be obedient to Him. This we must render, Ps. 116: 12.

II. He appoints him a particular service, in which he must now show his obedience, more than in any thing he had done yet. Samuel promises God's authority to the command, as the Lord of hosts, of all hosts, of Israel's hosts: he also gives him a reason for the command, that the severity he must use might not seem hard, I remember what Amalek did to Israel, v. 2. Ex. 17: 8, &c. and the crime is aggravated, Deut. 25: 18. God then swore He would have war with Amalek from generation to generation, and that, in process of time, he would utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek; that is the work Saul is now appointed to do, v. 3. He is expressly commanded to kill and slay all before him, man, woman, infant, suckling, ox, sheep, camel, ass; he is not to spare out of pity nor out of covetousness. Note, 1. Injuries done to God's Israel, will certainly be reckoned for sooner or later, especially the opposition given them, when coming out of Egypt. 2. God often bears long with those that are marked for ruin. 3. Though He bear long, He will not bear always. The year of recompense will come, slow, yet sure. 4. The longer judgment is delayed, many times the more severe it is when it comes. 5. God chooses instruments to do his work, that are fittest for it. This bloody work, therefore, Saul, a rough, severe man, must do.

III. Saul hereupon musters his forces, and makes a descent on Amalek; an immense army, v. 4. When he was to engage the Philistines and the success was hazardous, he had but 600; (ch. 13: 15.) but now he was to attack the Amalekites, by express order from Heaven, in which he was sure of victory, he had thousands at his call. It was not now for the honor of Judah, that their forces were numbered by themselves, their quota was scandalously short, (whatever the reason,) but a twentieth part of the whole, (10,000,) when the other ten tribes (for I except Levi) were 200,000. Judah's honor was near, but not yet. Telaim signifies lambs. Saul numbered them like lambs, so the Vulg. numbered them by the paschal lambs, so the Chaldee, allowing ten to a lamb, a way of numbering used by the Jews in the latter times of their nation. Amalek was the metropolis, and Saul drew his forces there, (v. 5.) that he might provoke them to give him battle.

IV. He gave friendly advice to the Kenites, to separate themselves from the Amalekites, v. 6. This was prudent and pious, and, probably, according to Samuel's direction. The Kenites were of the family of Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, a people that dwelt in tents, which made it easy to them, on every occasion, to remove; a hardy people that could live any where, and preferred fastnesses, Num. 24: 21. Balaam had foretold, they should be wasted; (v. 22.) however, Saul must not waste them. But, 1. He acknowledges the kindness of their ancestors. Jethro and his family had been very helpful and serviceable to Israel; and this is remembered to their posterity many ages after. Thus a good man leaves the divine

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—3. Probably Saul had scarcely noticed Samuel at all for some years. (See note on external policy of Heb. govt. from JAHN, p. 661, vol. 1, and notes, Ex. 17: 8.) Perhaps he resented the sharp rebuke he had before received: and Samuel did not intrude himself. But now, he was sent to Saul with an express command, to go and utterly destroy the Amalekites. (14: 48.) In delivering his message he seemed to intimate, that unless Saul 'hearkened to the voice of the words of the LORD,' he should be authorized to denounce the sentence of rejection against him; and he gave him his instructions in the most explicit and particular manner. The Amalekites had long before been condemned; (Notes, Ex. 17: 8—16. Deut. 25: 17—19.) [and extermination seems the only method in which their inveterate plundering habits could be guarded against;] but the nation had been spared, till it had filled up the measure of its iniquities.—The righteous Lord certainly did no injustice to individuals; [note, Josh. 23: 3—10.] and the example was of a salutary tendency, to deter others in future ages from 'meddling to their hurt' with the servants of the living God. (M. R.—Notes, Num. 31: 2. Josh. 6: 21.)

(3.) Now go and smite, &c.] 'The Amalekites took care to deserve excision, by continuing to manifest the most hostile disposition to the Heb. nation, by attacking them whenever they had an opportunity, and joining their enemies on all occasions, to oppress and enslave them. They joined the Canaanites, and destroyed many of the people, [in manifest contempt of God's power and justice lately displayed,] upon their attempts to enter Canaan. They united with the Moabites, and smote Israel, dispossessed them of the city of palm trees, and helped to reduce them to an 18 yrs. servitude. They oppressed them also with the Midianites, and utterly impoverished them by their rapines and plunders; destroying the increase of the earth, leaving no sustenance for Israel, neither for the sheep, the oxen, or asses; and afterwards attacked them in battle as confederates with the Midianitish army. Under Saul's reign they continued their ravages, and spoiled the people, and when he had repulsed them he received command utterly to extirpate them.' Chandler, in WILLIAMS.

part, get you down from among the Amalekites, lest I destroy you with them: for [m]ye showed kindness to all the children of Israel when they came up out of Egypt. So the Kenites departed from among the Amalekites.

7 And Saul [n]smote the Amalekites from [o]Havilah until thou comest to [p]Shur, that is over against Egypt.

8 And he took [q]Agag the king of the Amalekites alive, and [r]utterly destroyed all the people with the edge of the sword.

9 But Saul and the people spared Agag, and [s]the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of [*] the fatlings, and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them: but every thing that was vile and refuse, that they destroyed utterly.

10 ¶ Then came the word of the LORD unto Samuel, saying,

11 It [t]repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king: for he is [u]turned back from following me, and [x]hath not performed my commandments. And [y] it grieved Samuel; and [z]he cried unto the LORD all night.

12 And when Samuel rose early to meet Saul in the morning, it was told Samuel, saying, Saul came to [a]Carmel, and, behold, [b]he set him up a place, and is gone about, and passed on, and gone down to Gilgal.

13 And Samuel came to Saul; and Saul said unto him, [c]Blessed be thou of the Lord: [d]I have performed the commandment of the LORD.

blessing for an inheritance to his children's children. God is not unrighteous to forget the kindness shown his people; they shall be remembered another day, at furthest in the great day; I was an hungered, and ye gave Me meat. God's remembering the kindness of the Kenites' ancestors, now when punishing the injuries done by the ancestors of the Amalekites, helped to clear his righteousness in that dispensation. If He entail favors, why may He not frowns? He espouses his people's cause, so as to bless those that bless them; and therefore so as to curse those that curse them, Num. 24: 9. Gen. 12: 3. 2. He desires them to remove from among the Amalekites. When destroying judgments are abroad, God will separate between the precious and the vile, and hide the meek of the earth in the day of his anger. It is dangerous to be found in the company of God's enemies, and it is our duty and interest to come out from among them, lest we share in their sins and plagues, Rev. 18: 4. The Jews have a saying, Woe to the wicked man, and woe to his neighbor.

V. Saul prevailed against the Amalekites, for it was rather an execution than a war; the issue could not be dubious when the cause was just, and the call so clear; He smote them, (v. 7.) utterly destroyed them, v. 8. Now they paid dear for the sin of their ancestors; God sometimes lays up iniquity for the children. They were idolaters, and guilty of many other sins; yet when God would reckon with them, He fastened on the sin of their ancestors in abusing his Israel, as the ground of his quarrel. Lord, how unsearchable are thy judgments, yet how incontestable thy righteousness!

VI. Yet Saul did his work by halves, v. 9. 1. He spared Agag, because a king like himself, and, perhaps, in hope to get a great ransom for him. 2. He spared the best of the cattle, and destroyed only the refuse, that was good for little. Many, we may suppose, made their escape, with their effects, into other countries, therefore we read of Amalekites after this, but that could not be helped; it was Saul's fault, that he did not destroy such as came to his hands, and were in his power. What was now destroyed, was, in effect, sacrificed to the justice of God, as the God to whom vengeance belongeth; and for Saul to think the torn and the sick, the lame and the lean, good enough for that, while he reserved for his own fields, and his own table, the firstlings and the fat, was really to honor himself more than God.

V. 10—23. Remarkable instances we have here of the strictness of God's justice, and the treachery and deceitfulness of man's heart. We are here told,

I. God determines Saul's rejection, and acquaints Samuel with it. It repenteth Me that I have set up Saul to be king. Repentance in God is not, as in us, a change of mind, but a change of method or dispensation. He does not alter his will, but wills an alteration. The change was in Saul, he is turned back from following Me; this construction God put upon the partiality of his obedience, and the prevalency of his covetousness. It grieved Samuel that Saul had forfeited God's favor, and God had resolved to cast him off; and he cried unto the Lord all night, spent a whole night in interceding for him. He did not thus deprecate his own exclusion from the government. The rejection of sinners is the grief of good people. God delights not in their death, nor should we.

II. Samuel being sent of God to Saul with these heavy tidings, went to meet him, perhaps according to an appointment, when Saul went forth on this expedition, for Saul was come to Gilgal, (v 12.) the place where he was made king, (ch. 11· 15.) and where now he would have been confirmed, had he approved himself well in this trial of his obedience. But Samuel was informed Saul had, 1. Set him up a triumphal arch, or some monument of his victory, at Carmel, a city in the mountains of Judah, seeking his own honor more than the honor of God, for he set up this place (or hand, as the word is) for himself: he had more need to have been repenting of his sin, and making his peace with God, than boasting of his victory. 2. That he had marched in great state to Gilgal, for that seems to be intimated in the manner of expression, he is gone about and passed on, and gone down, with a great deal of pomp and parade. There Samuel met him.

(1.) Saul boasts to Samuel of his obedience, because that was the thing by which he was now to signalize himself, v. 13. and by this he hoped to prevent Samuel's reproving him. Thus sinners think, by justifying themselves, to escape being judged of the Lord; whereas the only way to do that, is, by judging ourselves. They that boast most of their religion, may justly be suspected of partiality and hypocrisy in it.

(2.) Saul would needs have it thought God was wonderfully beholden to him for the good service he had done; but Samuel shows him God was so far from being a debtor to him, that He had just cause of action against him, and produces for evidence the bleating of the sheep and the lowing of the oxen, which, perhaps, Saul appointed to bring up the rear of his triumph, but Samuel appeals to them as witnesses against him. Note, It is no new thing for the plausible professions and protestations of hypocrites to be contradicted and disproved by plain and undeniable evidence. Many boast of their obedience to the command of God; but what mean then their indulgence of the flesh, their love of the world, their passion and uncharitableness, and their neglect of holy duties, which witness against them?

(3.) Saul insists on his own justification, v. 15. [1.] It was not his fault; the people spared them; as if they durst have done it without the express orders of Saul, when they knew it was against the express orders of Samuel. Note, Those that are willing to justify themselves, are commonly

Verses 13, 14.

Perhaps Saul was in some degree conscious of having done wrong; and he therefore addressed Samuel in this respectful language, in order to conciliate his good will, and to ward off the rebuke which he feared. Some however think he was so insensible of having committed any fault, that he was disposed to boast of his obedience, and expected to be congratulated and commended by the prophet. (M. R.) SCOTT.

forward to condemn others, and to lay blame on any rather than themselves. It is a sorry subterfuge of an impenitent heart that will not confess its guilt, to blame those that were either tempters, or partners, or only followers in it. [2.] It was with a good intention: 'to sacrifice to the Lord thy God.' But this was false, both Saul and the people designed their own profit in sparing the cattle; and if not, it was frivolous, for God hates robbery for burnt-offering; God appointed these cattle to be sacrificed to Him in the field, and therefore will give no thanks to those that bring them to be sacrificed at his altar: He will be served in his own way, according to the rule He Himself has prescribed. Nor will a good intention justify a bad action.

(4.) Samuel overrules, or rather overlooks, his plea, and proceeds, in God's name, (v. 16.) to give judgment against him. Those who complain that their ministers are too harsh with them, should remember, that, while they keep to the Word of God, they are but messengers, and must say as they are bidden; and therefore be willing, as Saul himself here was, that they should say on. He delivers his message faithfully. [1.] He reminds him of the honor God had done him in making him king, v. 17. Note, Those that are advanced to honor and wealth, ought often to remember their mean beginnings, that they may never think highly of themselves, but always study to do great things for the God who has advanced them. [2.] He lays before him the plainness of the orders he was to execute, v. 18. The Lord sent thee on a journey; so easy was the service, and so certain the success, that it was rather to be called a journey, than a war; and had he denied himself, so far as to have destroyed all that belonged to Amalek, God would, no doubt, have made it up to him, so that he should have no need of spoil. Therefore, [3.] He shows him how inexcusable he was, in aiming to make a handle of this expedition, and to enrich himself by it, v. 19. See of what evil the love of money is the root; but see what is the sinfulness of sin, and that in it which above any thing else makes it evil in the sight of the Lord: disobedience; thou didst not obey the Lord.

(5.) Saul repeats his vindication of himself, as what, in defiance of conviction, he resolved to abide by, v. 20, 21. He denies the charge, v. 20. He had done all he thought he needed to do, so much wiser was he in his own eyes than God Himself; God bade him kill all, and yet he puts in among the instances of his obedience, that he had brought Agag alive, which he thought was as good as if he had killed him. Thus carnal, deceitful hearts think to excuse themselves from God's commandments with their own equivalents. He insists, that he has utterly destroyed the Amalekites themselves, which was the main thing intended: but as to the spoil, he owns it should have been utterly destroyed; so he knew his Lord's will, and was under no mistake about the command: but he thought that would be wilful waste; the cattle of the Midianites was taken for a prey in Moses' time, Num. 31: 22. and why not the cattle of the Amalekites now? Better it should be a prey to the Israelites, than to the fowls of the air and the wild beasts; therefore he connived at the people in carrying it away; but it was their doing, not his; and besides, it was for sacrifice to the Lord here at Gilgal, whither they were now bringing them. See what a hard thing it is to convince the children of disobedience of their sin, and to strip them of their fig-leaves.

(6.) Samuel fully answers his apology. v. 22, 23. He appeals to his own conscience, Has the Lord as great delight in sacrifices as in obedience? Saul was not a man of any great acquaintance with religion, yet he could not but know [1.] That nothing is so pleasing to God as obedience, no, not sacrifice and offering, and the fat of rams. What we should aim at in all the exercises of religion, is acceptance with God. If God be well pleased with us, and our services, we are happy, otherwise, to what purpose is it? Isa. 1: 11. Here we are plainly told, that humble, sincere, conscientious obedience to the will of God, is more pleasing and acceptable to Him than all burnt-offering and sacrifices. A careful conformity to moral precepts recommends us to God more than all ceremonial observances. Mic. 6: 6—8. Hos. 6: 6. Obedience is enjoined by the eternal law of nature, sacrifice only by a positive law: obedience was

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21. Those who have not learned to obey God, are not well qualified to rule over others, especially over the Lord's people.—When He calls us to our work, and his time is come, He will provide us helpers, and give us success; but He will at the same time make trial of our spirits. We must not avenge ourselves without express command; but we may at any time requite the kindness of our benefactors: and those who do good to the worshippers and servants of God for his sake, treasure up blessings for their posterity.—It is dangerous to live among wicked people; and if we would not perish with them, we must keep separate from them, as far as consists with our various duties.—The pride of man's heart can admit the blasphemous idea of being more merciful than God, and of censuring the threatened punishment of sinners as too severe! while covetousness deems the 'vile and refuse' good enough to be spent wholly in religion; (Mal. 1: 12—14.) Many observable circumstances betray the hypocrisy of some confident professors of godliness; and it will always be necessary to drive sinners from their subterfuges, to show them the malignity and aggravation of their offences, to silence their objections and excuses, and to urge conviction upon their hearts: though the convincing Spirit of God alone can render the means effectual. Verse 22.

Submission to the authority of God, must be essential to true religion under every dispensation: but there is a great difference between the submission of a holy, and that of a sinful creature. External obedience, even to moral precepts, is good in the sight of God, only when it springs from a willing submission of the soul to the divine authority. To profess a belief of the Gospel is good, only when it arises from submission to the divine teaching, to the justice of the condemnation under which sinners are concluded, and to the wisdom, suitableness, and grace of the method of salvation there revealed. All instituted worship derives its obligation from the express appointment of God, from the honor which it renders to his name, from the disposition of the worshipper, and from the grace and spiritual blessings which are communicated by it. Sacrifices especially declared the desert of the offender, and typified the sufferings of the Savior: their value resulted entirely from the appointment of God, [note, Lev 10: 1. last part]; and they were not acceptable, except offered in obedience to Him, and with a penitent, believing, and pious mind. (Jer. 7: 21—23.) When therefore they were substituted in the place of true piety, or trusted in as meritorious; when the means were used to compensate for the neglect of the end, and the sign was exalted into the place of the thing signified; they became an abomination, however costly and numerous they were.—Had Saul offered thousands of bullocks and rams, not of the spoils of Amalek, but from his own herds and flocks, exactly according to the divine ritual, in an im-sacrifice; and to hearken, than the fat of rams.

23 For [s]rebellion is as the sin of [*] witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry: because [t]thou hast rejected the word of the LORD, he hath also rejected thee from being king.

24 And Saul said unto Samuel, [u]I have sinned: for I have transgressed the commandment of the LORD, and thy words; because [x]I feared the people, and [y]obeyed their voice.

25 Now therefore, I pray thee, [z]pardon my sin, and turn again with me, that I may worship the LORD.

26 And Samuel said unto Samuel, [a]I will not return with thee: for [b]thou hast rejected the word of the LORD, and the LORD hath rejected thee from being king over Israel.

27 And as Samuel turned about to go away, he laid hold upon the skirt of his mantle, and it rent.

28 And Samuel said unto him, [c]The LORD hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and [d]hath given it to [e]a neighbor of thine, that is better than thou.

29 And also [f]the † Strength of Israel [g]will not lie, nor repent: for he is not a the law of innocency; sacrifice supposes sin, and is but a feeble attempt to take that away which obedience would have prevented. God is more glorified, and self more denied, by obedience than by sacrifice. It is much easier to bring a bullock or lamb to be burnt on the altar, than to bring every high thought into obedience to God, and the will subject to his will. Obedience is the glory of angels, Ps. 103: 20. and will be ours. [2.] That nothing is so provoking to God as disobedience, setting up our wills in competition with his, here called rebellion and stubbornness, and said to be as bad as witchcraft and idolatry, v. 23. It is as bad to set up other gods, as to live in disobedience to the true God. They that are governed by their own corrupt inclinations, in opposition to the command of God, do, in effect, consult the Teraphim, (as the word here is for idolatry,) or the diviners. It was disobedience that made us all sinners; Rom. 5: 19. and this is the malignity of sin, that it is the transgression of the law, and consequently enmity to God, Rom. 8: 7.

Lastly, He reads his doom, in short, 'Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, hast despised it, so the Chald. hast made nothing of it, so the Sept. hast cast off the government of it; therefore He has rejected thee, despised and made nothing of thee, but cast thee off from being king.' Those are unfit and unworthy to rule over men, who are not willing that God should rule over them.

V. 24—31. Saul is at length put into the dress of a penitent; but too evidently only in semblance. Observe,—

1. How poorly he expresses his repentance. It was with much ado he was made sensible of his fault, and not till he was threatened with being deposed; that touched him in a tender part, then he began to relent, v. 24. But his confession was not ingenuous, but extorted only, and forced.

Observe the bad signs of its hypocrisy; it came short even of Ahab's.

1. He made his application to Samuel only, and seemed most solicitous to stand right in his opinion, and to gain his favor. He makes a little god of him, only to preserve his reputation with the people, because they all knew Samuel to be a prophet, and the man that had been the instrument of his preferment. Thinking it would please Samuel, and be a sort of bribe to him, he puts it into his confession, I have transgressed the commandments of the Lord, and thy word; as if he had been in God's stead, v. 24. David, though convinced by the ministry of Nathan, yet in his confession, has his eye to God alone, not to Nathan; Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned: but Saul, ignorantly enough, confesses his sin as a transgression of Samuel's word; whereas his word was no other than a declaration of the commandment of the Lord. He also applies to Samuel for forgiveness, v. 25. as if any could forgive sin but God only. Those wretchedly deceive themselves, who, when fallen into scandalous sin, think it enough to make their peace with the church and their ministers, by the show and plausible profession of repentance, without caring to make their peace with God by the sincerity of it. The most charitable construction we can put on this of Saul here, is, to suppose he looked on Samuel as a sort of mediator between him and God, and intended an address to God in his application to him: however, it was very weak.

2. He excused his fault even in the confession of it, and that is never the fashion of a true penitent; v. 24. 'Because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice.' We have reason enough to think it was purely his own doing, not the people's; if they were forward to do it, he knew how to keep up his authority, and stood not in awe of them: the excuse was false and frivolous; whatever he pretended, he did not really fear the people. But it is common for sinners, in excusing their faults, to plead the thoughts and workings of their own minds, because, how groundless soever, no man can disprove them; but they forget that God searcheth the heart.

3. All his care was to save his credit, and preserve his interest in the people, lest they should revolt from him, or at least despise him; v. 25, 27. not that he cared for Samuel, but he feared, if Samuel forsook him, the people would do so too. Many seem zealously affected to good ministers and good people, only for the sake of their own interest and reputation, while in heart they hate them. But his expression was very gross when he said, (v. 30.) I have sinned, yet honor me, I pray thee, before my people. Is this the language of a penitent? No, but the contrary; 'I have sinned, shame me now, for to me belongs shame, and no man can loathe me so much as I loathe myself.' Yet how often do we meet with the copies of this hypocrisy of Saul! It is very common for those who are convinced of sin, to show themselves very solicitous to be honored before the people. Whereas he that has lost the honor of an innocent, can pretend to no other than that of a penitent, and it is the honor of a penitent to take shame to himself.

II. How little he got by these thin shows of repentance. 1. Samuel repeated the sentence passed on him, so far was he from giving him any hopes of the repeal of it, v. 26. the same with v. 23. He that covers his sins, shall never prosper. Samuel refused to turn back with him, but turned about to go away, v. 27. As the thing appeared at first, he thought it altogether unfit so far to countenance one whom God had rejected, as to join him in giving thanks to God for a victory, which was made to serve rather Saul's covetousness than God's glory. Yet afterward he did turn again with him, (v. 31.) on further thoughts, and, probably, by divine direction, either to prevent a mutiny among the people, or perhaps, not to honor Saul, (for though Saul worshipped the Lord, (v. 31.) it is not said Samuel presided in that worship,) but to do justice on Agag, v. 32.

2. He illustrated the sentence by a sign, which Saul himself, by his rudeness, gave occasion for. When Samuel was turning from him, he tore his clothes to detain him, (v. 27.) so loath was he to penitent and self-confident disposition, God would have abhorred them: how much more then, when the animals to be sacrificed were spared, in direct disobedience to his express command!—Samuel did not therefore mean to exalt one part of external religion by depreciating another, as many seem to suppose; but to show that a right state of the heart is essential to the acceptable performance of every service. (M. R.—Ps. 50: 7—15. Prov. 15: 8, 9. Is. 1: 10—15. Am. 5: 21—24.) SCOTT.

Verse 23.

The heinousness of any sin is not to be judged of, by the magnitude of the object about which it is committed, or the grossness of the outward action; but from the deliberate and determined disobedience of the will, whence it takes [its character]. (Note, Gen. 3: 6.) When the Lord expressly says, 'Thou shalt;' and his rational creature dares to persist in saying, 'I will not;' whether the contest be about an apple or a kingdom, it is stubbornness and rebellion, a contempt of the commandment of God, and a daring insult to his majesty and authority; and has in it all the essential malignity, which constitutes idolatry or witchcraft, or crimes punishable by death according to the divine law. Therefore Saul for this rebellion was condemned to lose his kingdom. (13: 13—15.) ID.

Witchcraft.] Probably Saul had before this shown much zeal against those who practised witchcraft; (28: 3.) and this circumstance would add poignancy to Samuel's reproof. SCOTT.

Verses 26—28.

Verse 29.

The Strength of Israel.] Or, 'The victory of Israel.' (M.) Saul took the honor of the victory, and of Israel's protection, to himself, and raised a trophy of it (12): but Samuel seems to have indirectly rebuked his vanity, and reminded him that the eternal God was indeed 'Israel's Strength and Victory.'—'The LORD repented of having set up Saul to be king;' (Note, 11.) for, not having confirmed his promise of the kingdom to him by an oath, an opening was left for the change of measures intended by this expression. But Saul had now provoked Him to pass sentence against him, and as with a solemn oath to declare that it was irreversible. In that case, God is never said to repent; nay, it is spoken of as an impossibility that He should. (Num. 14: 27—30. Ps. 95: 9—11. 110: 4. Heb. 3: 14—19. 6: 13—20. 7: 20—22.) SCOTT.

man, that he should repent.

30 Then he said, I have sinned; yet [h] honor me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people, and before Israel, and turn again with me, [i] that I may worship the LORD thy God.

31 So Samuel turned again after Saul, and Saul worshipped the LORD.

32 ¶ Then said Samuel, Bring ye hither to me Agag, the king of the Amalekites: and Agag came unto him delicately. And [k] Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past.

33 And Samuel said, [l] As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. And Samuel [m] hewed Agag in pieces before the LORD in Gilgal.

34 Then Samuel went to Ramah; and Saul went up to his house to [n] Gibeah of Saul.

35 And [o] Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death; nevertheless, [p] Samuel mourned for Saul: and the LORD [q] repented that he had made Saul king over Israel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 22—35. In exercising the sacred ministry, nothing is of more importance, than an accurate knowledge of the relative and comparative value of the truths, precepts, and ordinances of religion; about which hypocrites greatly mistake, and thus impose upon themselves.—When the sentence of final rejection is irreversibly denounced, repentance will be unavailing: and though our God is now ready to forgive, He will hereafter neither repent, nor change his purposes of vengeance; for the 'Strength of Israel' will be eternally engaged to punish his stoutest and proudest foes. —The mighty of the earth are so accustomed to flattery and distinction, that they can scarcely suppose any will dare to withhold it from them: but 'with God there is no respect of persons;' and, while He requires his servants to honor those who are in authority, He teaches them to be of his judgment concerning comparative excellency.—Our warfare indeed is of a different nature from Saul's: but if we spare one domineering lust, or profitable iniquity, we shall forfeit the promised kingdom with deep disgrace; as our sincerity must be approved by devoting every sin to utter destruction, by the power of God's grace, and for the glory of his name. For this, in all ages and nations, is the line of distinction between Samuel and Saul, between the Christian and the hypocrite; that the one levels his whole force against Agag against that sinful propensity, which, by constitution and custom, has the greatest ascendency, that he may hew it in pieces before the Lord; while the other is anxious to preserve his master-sin, however willing he may appear to mortify, or refrain from, those sins, to which he has been less addicted, and to which he feels less temptation. Agag was indeed the chief person who ought to have been slain, both as the head of the devoted nation, and for his own cruelties. Thus the prophet, who was of a lenient spirit, and prayed all night for Saul, did not hesitate to execute that sentence of God upon this condemned criminal, which Saul, who afterwards proved himself exceedingly cruel, had not done. the history of David, one that makes as great a figure in the sacred history, as almost any of the worthies of the Old Testament; one that both with his sword and with his pen served the honor of God, and the interests of Israel, as much as most ever did, and was as illustrious a type of Christ.

Samuel was retired to Ramah, resolved to appear no more in public, but to addict himself wholly to instructing and training up the sons of the prophets, over whom he presided, as we find, ch. 19: 20. and we do not find that, to his dying day, God called him out to any public action relating to the state, but only here to anoint David.

I. God reproves him for continuing so long to mourn for the rejection of Saul. He does not blame him for mourning, but for exceeding in his sorrow, v. 1. He must recover himself, and not go mourning to his grave. 1. Because he ought to acquiesce in the divine justice, and forget his affection to Saul; if God will be glorified in his ruin, Samuel ought to be satisfied. Besides, to what purpose should he weep? The decree is gone forth, and all his prayers and tears cannot prevail to reverse it, 2 Sam. 12: 22, 23. 2. Because Israel shall be no loser by it, and Samuel must prefer the public welfare before his own private affection to his friend. 'Mourn not for Saul, for I have provided Me a king. The people provided them a king and he proved bad, now I will provide Me one, a man after my own heart.' See Ps. 89: 20. Acts 13: 22.

II. He sends him to Beth-lehem, to anoint one of the sons of Jesse, a person, probably, not unknown to Samuel. Samuel objects the peril of going, v. 2. By this it appears, 1. Saul was grown very wicked and outrageous since his rejection, else Samuel would not have mentioned this. What impiety would he not be guilty of, who durst kill Samuel? 2. Samuel's faith was not so strong as one would have expected, else he had not thus feared Saul. But the best men are not perfect in their faith, nor will fear be wholly cast out any where on this side heaven. But this may be understood as Samuel's desire of direction how to manage this matter prudently, so as not to expose himself, or any other, more than needed.

III. God orders him to cover his design with a sacrifice. It was proper he should sacrifice, when he came to anoint a king, ch. 11: 15. As a prophet, he might sacrifice when and where God appointed; and it was not at all inconsistent with the laws of truth, to say, he came to sacrifice, when really he did so, though he had also a further end, which he thought fit to conceal. Let him notify a sacrifice, and invite Jesse (probably the principal man of the city) and his family to come to the feast on the sacrifice; and, says God, I will show thee what thou shalt do. Those that go about God's work in God's way, shall be directed step by step, wherever they are at a loss, to do it in the best manner.

IV. Samuel went accordingly to Beth-lehem, not in pomp, or with any retinue, only a servant to lead the heifer, which he was to sacrifice; yet the elders of Beth-lehem trembled at his coming, fearing it was an indication of God's displeasure, and that he came to denounce judgment on them for the iniquities of the place; or, that it might be an occasion of Saul's displeasure against them, for, probably, they knew how much he was exasperated at Samuel, and feared he would pick a quarrel with them for entertaining him. They asked him, 'Comest thou peaceably? in peace thyself, not flying from Saul? at peace with us, not come with a message of wrath?' Samuel kept at home, and it was a strange thing to see him so far from his own house; they therefore concluded it must needs be some extraordinary occasion that brought him, and feared the worst till he satisfied them; (v. 5.) and bid them sanctify themselves, and prepare to join with him in the sacrifice he was about to offer. Note, Before solemn ordinances there must be a solemn preparation. When we are to offer spiritual sacrifices, it concerns us, by sequestering ourselves from the world, and renewing the dedication of ourselves to God, to sanctify ourselves. When our Lord Jesus came into the world, though men had reason enough to tremble, (and all Jerusalem was troubled,) fearing his errand was to condemn the world, yet He gave full assurance that He came peaceably, for He came to sacrifice, and brought his offering with Him; a body hast thou prepared Me; let us sanctify ourselves, that we may have an interest in his sacrifice. Samuel said, 'I come peaceably, for I come to sacrifice.' Note, Religious exercises must not be performed tumultuously.

V. He had a particular regard to Jesse and his sons, for with them his private business lay, with which, it is likely, he acquainted Jesse at his first coming, and took up his lodging at his house. He spoke to all the elders to sanctify themselves, but he sanctified Jesse, and his sons, by praying with them and instructing them. It appears, ch. 20: 29. it was a devout, religious family. Samuel assisted them in their family preparations for the public sacrifice, and, it is probable, chose out David, and anointed him, at the family solemnities, before the sacrifice was offered, or the holy feast solemnized. Perhaps he offered private sacrifices, like Job, according to the number of them all, and, under color of that, called for them all to appear before him. When signal blessings are coming into a family, they ought to sanctify themselves.

V. 6—13. I. How all the elder sons of Jesse were passed by, who stood fairest for the preferment. Eliab, the eldest, was privately presented first, probably none being present but Jesse, and Samuel thought he must needs be the man, v. 6. The prophets themselves, when from under the divine direction, were as liable to mistake as other men; as Nathan, 2 Sam. 7: 3. But God rectified Samuel's mistake, by a secret whisper to his mind, v. 7. It was strange he, who had been so wretchedly disappointed in Saul, whose countenance and stature recommended him as much as any man's could, should be so forward to judge of a man by that rule. When God would please the people with a king, He chose a handsome man, but when He would have one after his own heart, He would not choose him by the outside; men judge by the sight of the eyes, but God looks on the heart; i. e. He knows it. 1 Pet. 3: 4.

II. After all, David, the youngest son, at length was pitched upon. His name signifies beloved, for he was a type of the Beloved Son. Observe,

1. How he was now employed, v. 11. The youngest are commonly fondlings, but, it should seem, David was least set by of all the sons of Jesse; either they did not discern, or did not duly value, his excellent spirit. Many a great genius lies buried in obscurity and contempt; and God often exalts those whom men despise. The Son of David was He whom men despised, the Stone which the builders refused, and yet has a name above every name. David was taken from following the ewes, to feed Jacob; (as Moses from keeping the flock, to lead Israel;) an instance of his humility and industry, both which God delights to honor. We should think a military life, but God saw a pastoral life, (which gives advantage for contemplation, and communion with heaven,) the best preparative for kingly power, at least for those graces of the Spirit, necessary to the due discharge of the trust which attends it.

2. What appearance he made when he came. No doubt his clothing was according to his employment, mean and coarse, and he did not change his clothes as Joseph did; but he had a very honest look, not stately, as Saul's, but sweet and lovely, (v. 12.) that is, a clear complexion, a good eye, and a lovely face; the features extraordinary, and something in his looks very charming. Though far from using any art to help his beauty, and his employment exposed it to the sun and wind, yet nature kept its own, and, by the sweetness of his aspect, gave manifest indications of an amiable temper and disposition of mind. Perhaps his modest blush, when brought before Samuel, and received by him with surprising respect, made him look much the handsomer.

3. The anointing of him. The Lord told Samuel in his ear, (as He had done, ch. 9: 15.) this was he whom he must anoint, v. 12. Samuel objected not to the meanness of his education, his youth, or the little respect he had in his own family, but, in obedience to the divine command, took his horn of oil, and anointed him, (v. 13.) signifying thereby, a divine designation to the government, after the death of Saul, of which hereby he gave him a full assurance; and a divine communication of gifts and graces, to fit him to govern, and to make him a type of Him who was to be the Messiah, the Anointed One, who received the spirit, not by measure, but without measure. He is said to be anointed in the midst of his brethren, who yet, possibly, did not understand it as a designation to the government, and therefore did not envy David, as Joseph's brethren did him; because they saw no further marks of dignity put upon him. But Patrick reads it, He anointed him from the midst of his brethren, i. e. singled him out from the rest, and privately anointed him, but with a charge to keep his own counsel, and not to let his own brethren know it, as by what we find (ch. 17: 28.) it should seem, Eliab did not. It is computed David was now about 20 years old; if so, his troubles by Saul lasted 10 years, for he was 30 when Saul died. Lightfoot reckons him about 25, and that his troubles lasted but 5 years.

4. The happy effects of this anointing, v. 13. The anointing was not an empty ceremony, but a divine power went along with it; so that David found himself inwardly advanced in wisdom and courage, and concern for the public, with all the qualifications of a prince, though not at all advanced in his outward circumstances. This would abundantly satisfy him that his election was of God. The best evidence of our being predestinated to the kingdom of glory, is, our being sealed with the Spirit of promise, and our experience of a work of grace in our hearts. Some think the courage, by which he slew the lion and the bear, and his extraordinary skill in music, were the effects and evidences of the Spirit's coming upon him. However, this made him the sweet psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. 23: 1. Samuel, having done this, went to Ramah in safety, and we never read of him again but once, (ch. 19: 18.) till we read of his death; now he retired to die in peace, since his eyes had seen the salvation, even the sceptre brought into the tribe of Judah.

V. 14—23. We have here Saul falling, and David rising.

I. Saul is made a terror to himself, v. 14. Having forsaken God and his duty, God, in righteous judgment, withdrew from him those assistances of the good Spirit with which he was directed, animated, and encouraged in his government and wars. He lost all his good qualities This was the effect of his rejecting God, and an evidence of his being rejected by Him. Now God took his mercy from Saul, (as it is expressed, 2 Sam. 7: 15.) for when the Spirit of the Lord departs from us, all good goes. When men grieve and quench the Spirit, by wilful sin, He departs, and will not always strive. The consequence of this was, that an evil spirit from God troubled him. They that drive the good Spirit away from them, become of course a prey to the evil spirit. If God and his grace do not rule us, sin and Satan will The devil, by the divine permission, troubled and terrified Saul, by means of the corrupt humors of his body, and passions of his mind. He grew fretful, peevish, discontented; timorous and suspicious, ever and anon starting and trembling; sometimes, says Josephus, as if he had been choked

Verse 14.

When the Spirit of God came on David, it became evident He had departed from Saul, nay, that an evil spirit was judicially permitted to impel him to the most furious sallies of rage or jealousy; to oppress his spirits with a deep melancholy; to excite distressing terrors, alarms and suspicions; and to render him at times distracted. (M. R. d.) SCOTT.

An evil spirit, &c.] 'Whether this was a diabolical possession, or a mere mental malady, the learned are not agreed: it seems to have partaken of both. There is too much of apparent nature in it, to permit us to believe it was all spiritual, and too much of apparent spiritual influence in it, to suffer us to believe it was all natural.'

'Saul, by his disobedience, had provoked God, so that He no longer directed and prospered him; but left him a prey to his own gloomy mind. [And in the history of Saul (whose moral character, seeming at first to have been about equally balanced between vice and virtue, is a type of that of perhaps nearly half the human race) let us trace the progress of moral deterioration, in the plain story of his life as here recorded. "Every time a man does wrong, i. e. yields to his lower propensities, [in preference to his higher sentiments, where their impulses clash,] he loses self-control; he gives to his passions power over him; he weakens [too] the practical supremacy of conscience, and becomes more perfectly a slave. The design of the Christian religion, in this respect, is, to bring us under the dominion of conscience enlightened by revelation, and deliver us from the slavery of evil propensity." ... {for} "by every act of vicious indulgence, we give our passions more uncontrolled power over us, and diminish the power of reason and conscience, ... according to the universal law of our faculties, that they are strengthened by use, and weakened by disuse. ... Thus, by every act of sin, we not only incur new guilt, but we strengthen the bias towards sin, during the whole of our subsequent being. Hence every vicious act renders our return to virtue more difficult, and more hopeless. The tendency of such a course is, to give to habit the power which ought to be exerted by our will. And, hence, it is not improbable, that the conditions of our being may be such, as to allow of arriving at a state, in which reformation may be actually impossible. That the Holy Scriptures allude to such a condition, [comp. Ex. 4: 21. 14: 4, &c. Josh. 11: 20. 1 Sam. 18: 12. 28: 6, &c.] during the present life, is evident. Such, also, is probably the condition of the wicked in another world." Pres. WAYLAND. Elts. Mor. I. Saul's servants have the honesty and courage to tell him his distemper, and prescribe music, as a cure. How much better friends had they been to him, had they advised him, to make his peace with God, by true repentance, to send for Samuel to pray with him, and to intercede for him; then might he not only have had some present relief, but the good Spirit would have returned. But their project is to make him merry, and so cure him. Many whose consciences are convinced and startled, are for ever ruined by such methods as these, which drown all care of the soul in the delights of sense. Yet Saul's servants did not amiss to send for music, as a help to cheer up the spirits, if they had but withal sent for a prophet to give him good counsel.

2. One recommended David for this. A very high character this servant of Saul here gives of David, (v. 18.) he was not only fit for his purpose as a comely person, and cunning in playing, but a man of courage and conduct, a mighty valiant man, and prudent in matters, fit to be further preferred, and (which crowned his character) the Lord is with him. By this it appears, that though David, after he was anointed, returned to his country-business, and there remained, yet the workings of the Spirit could not be hid, but made him shine in obscurity, so that all his neighbors observed with wonder the great improvements of his mind on a sudden. David, even in his shepherd's garb, is become an oracle, a champion, and every thing great. His fame reached the court soon, for Saul was inquisitive after such young men, ch. 14: 52.

3. David's father, very willing to part with him, sent him very readily, and with a present, to Saul; (v. 20.) according to the usage of those times, bread and wine, (comp. ch. 10: 3, 4.) therefore acceptable, because expressive of the homage and allegiance of him that sent it. Probably, Jesse, who knew what his son David was designed for, was aware Providence was herein fitting him for it, and therefore followed Providence very cheerfully, when he saw it plainly putting him in the way of preferment.

Saul became very kind to him, (v. 21.) loved him greatly, and designed to make him his armor-bearer, and (contrary to the manner of the king, ch. 8: 11.) asked his father's leave to keep him in his service, v. 22. And good reason he had to respect him, for he did him great service with his music, v. 23. His instrumental music with his harp is the only kind mentioned, but it should seem by the account Josephus gives of it, that he added vocal music to it, and sung hymns, probably divine hymns, songs of praise, to his harp. Music has a natural tendency to compose and ex-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our most reasonable and disinterested sorrow may be so excessive, as to imply rebellion against the righteous will of God; and He will then rebuke us, as well as encourage us under our distresses.—The most eminent believers are not entirely superior to the fear of man, when dangerous services are assigned them. But the Lord will inwardly strengthen and outwardly protect them: and, without immediate revelation, He can, by his Word and Spirit, show them step by step what they ought to do.—The guilty conscience trembles at a message from Heaven: yet the ministers of Christ come peaceably, proposing salvation through the sacrifice of a Redeemer, and speaking terror to none, except to those who neglect so great salvation. (Matt. 10: 11—15. P. O. 7—15.)—The Lord values nothing, in comparison with that holy faith, fear, and love, which are implanted in the heart beyond the reach of human penetration; and his method of educating men for important stations of usefulness, differs much from those which human wisdom has devised.—When sinners, by resisting the Holy Spirit, have provoked Him finally to depart, they are exposed to every incursion of Satan: indeed we none of us have the least security, either for our bodies or souls, against the malignity of evil spirits, except in the protection of that God, whom, alas! we are continually provoking. (P. O. Job 1: 6—12.)—When conscious guilt, and fears of divine vengeance, disorder the minds of men, nothing can effect a real cure, except the blood of Christ applied in faith, and the sanctifying Spirit sealing the pardon by his holy comforts: all other expedients to dispel religious melancholy, are sure methods of increasing distress, either in this world or in the next, and perhaps in both.—Every endowment, which may be usefully exercised in subserviency to godliness, is to be ascribed to the energy of the divine Spirit: opportunities will be afforded for its being displayed; and if the Lord be graciously with us, they will be suitably improved: while good behavior in inferior stations is the best introduction to higher advancement.—Thus Jesus was obedient unto death, before He was exalted to his glorious throne: and thus He trains up his people, by obedience, in the midst of temptation and trouble, for their future inheritance in the regions of purity and felicity.

David is anointed by Samuel. 2. Carries provisions to his brethren in the army. 3. Fights with and kills Goliath. 4. Is received into the king's court. 5. Contracts a friendship with Jonathan. 6. Incurs Saul's jealousy. 7. Retires to his father's house. 8. Is after some time sent for by Saul to soothe his melancholy with the harp. 9. Again excites Saul's jealousy; who endeavors to smite him with his javelin. This anticipation between the 14th and 23d verse, comes in, in the order of time, between verses 9 and 10. of ch. 18. where the breach is apparent.' Dr. A. The armies of Israel and of the Philistines are drawn out to battle, 1—3. Goliath challenges, defies, and dismays the Israelites, 4—11. David is sent to the army to visit his brethren, 12—19. He hears the challenge of Goliath and expresses indignation at it, 20—27. Eliab rebukes him, and he answers mildly, 28—30. He is brought before Saul, accepts the challenge, and states the grounds of his confidence, 31—37. He refuses Saul's armor; and takes only his staff, a sling, and stones, 38—40. Goliath disdains and curses him, 41—44. David answers, expressing his assured confidence in God, 45—47. He kills Goliath and cuts off his head, 48—51. The Philistines are routed, 52, 53. David returns with Goliath's head in his hand; and answers Saul's inquiries concerning him, 54—58.

Chap. XVII. David is the man whom God now delights to honor, for he is a man after his own heart. We read in the foregoing ch. how, after he was anointed, Providence made him famous in the court; we read in this, how Providence made him much more famous in the camp, and, by both, not only marked him for a great man, but fitted him for the throne to which he was designated.

V. 1—11. Not long ago the Philistines were soundly beaten before Israel, and would have been totally routed, had not Saul's rashness prevented; but here we have them making head again. Observe,

I. They defied Israel, with their armies, v. 1. They made a descent upon Israel, and possessed themselves, as it should seem, of a part of their country, for they encamped in a place which belongeth to Judah. Probably they had heard how Samuel had fallen out with Saul, and no longer assisted and advised him, and how Saul was grown melancholy, and unfit for business, and this encouraged them to make this attempt to retrieve their lately lost credit. The enemies of the church are watchful to take all advantages, and they never have greater, than when her protectors have provoked God's Spirit and prophets to leave them.

Saul mustered his forces, and faced them, v. 2, 3. And here we must notice, 1. The evil spirit, for the present, through God's mercy to Israel, had left Saul, ch. 16: 23. David's harp having given him some relief, perhaps, the alarms and affairs of the war prevented the return of the distemper. Business is a good antidote against melancholy. Let the mind have something without to fasten on, and employ itself about, and it will be less in danger of preying upon itself. 2. David was returned to Beth-lehem, v. 15. a rare instance, in a young man that stood so fair for preferment, of humility, and affection to his parents. None more fit for honor than he, nor that deserved it better, yet none more dead to it.

II. They defied Israel, with their champion Goliath, concerning whom observe, 1. His prodigious size. He was of the sons of Anak, (who at Gath kept their ground in Joshua's time, Josh. 11: 22 and kept up a race of giants there,) and, probably, one of the largest; in height six cubits and a span, v. 4. i. e. (so bishop Cumberland,) 11 ft. 4 in. reckoning a cubit 21 inches, and a span half a cubit: a monstrous stature, which made him very formidable, especially if he had strength and spirit proportionable.

2. His armor. He was well furnished with defensive armor, v. 5, 6. A helmet of brass on his head, a coat of mail, made of brass plates laid over one another, like the scales of a fish; and because his legs would lie most within the reach of an ordinary man, he wore brass boots, and a large corselet of brass about his neck. The coat is said to weigh 5,000 shekels; (a shekel was half an ounce avoirdupois;) but some think, not the weight, but the value of the coat, is meant. His offensive weapons were extraordinary, of which the spear only is here described, v. 7. His arm could manage what an ordinary man could scarcely heave. His shield only, which was the lightest of all his accoutrements, was carried before him by his esquire, probably, for state; for, clad in brass, he little needed a shield.

3. His challenge. He offers to put the war

[Comp. the right hand fig. in the cut, Ex. 17: 10.] Gill. Perhaps, as the shoulders are mentioned, the thing intended is that head and neck armor seen on an ancient Etruscan vase, (see *Rob. or a helmet with its shoulder piece, like that of the Samaritan warrior (taken from Trajan's column) in the cut. The cut (from Calmet) is generally given in illustration of the armor of Saul. Gibbon thus de

7 And [h] the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam, and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron: and one bearing a shield went before him.

8 And he stood and cried unto the armies of Israel, and said unto them, Why are ye come out to set your battle in array? am not I a Philistine, and ye [i] servants to Saul? choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me.

9 If he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants: but if I prevail against him, and kill him, than shall ye be our servants, and [k] serve us.

10 And the Philistine said, [l] I defy the armies of Israel this day; [m] give me a man that we may fight together.

11 When Saul and all Israel heard those words of the Philistine, they were [n] dismayed, and greatly afraid.

12 ¶ Now [o] David was the son of that [p] Ephrathite of Bethlehem-Judah, whose name was Jesse; and he had [q] eight sons: and the man went among men for an old man in the days of Saul.

13 And the three eldest sons of Jesse went and followed Saul to the battle: and [r] the names of his three sons that went to the battle were Eliab the first born, and next unto him Abinadab, and the third [s] Shammah.

14 And David was the youngest: and the three eldest followed Saul.

entirely on the issue of the duel he proposes; 'If your champion kills me, we will be your servants; if I kill him, you shall be ours.' This (says Patrick) was only a bravado, for no nation would be willing thus to venture its all on the success of one man, nor is it justifiable; notwithstanding Goliath's stipulation here, when he was killed, the Philistines did not stand to his word, nor submit themselves servants to Israel. When he boasts, I am a Philistine, and you servants to Saul, he would have it thought a great piece of condescension in him, a chief ruler, to enter the lists with an Israelite; for he looked on them as no better than slaves.

4. Israel's terror, v 11. The people would not have been dismayed, but that they observed Saul's courage failed him; and it is not to be expected, that, if the leader be a coward, the followers should be bold. We found before, when the Spirit of the Lord came upon Saul, (ch. 11: 6.) none could be more daring, more forward, to answer the challenge of Nahash the Ammonite; but now that Spirit was departed, even the big looks and big words of a single Philistine made him change color. But where was Jonathan all this while? Why did not he accept the challenge, who, in the late war, had so bravely engaged a whole army of Philistines? Doubtless, he felt not himself stirred up of God to it, as then. As the best, so the bravest men, are no more than what God makes them. Jonathan must now sit still, because the honor of engaging Goliath is reserved for David. In great and good actions, the wind of the Spirit blows when and where He listeth. Now the pious Israelites lament their king's breach with Samuel.

V. 12—30. We have in these verses,

I. The present state of David's family. His father was old, v. 12. so old as to be noticed for his great age, above what was usual at that time, therefore excused from public services. David's three elder brethren, who perhaps envied his place at court, had got their father to send for him home, and let them go to the camp, where they hoped to signalize themselves, and eclipse him; (v. 13, 14.) while David himself, far from being proud of the services he had done his prince, or ambitious of further preferment, had returned from court to the obscurity of his father's house, and to the care, and toil, and (as it proved, v. 34.) the peril, of keeping his father's sheep. Now he had that opportunity of meditation and prayer, and other acts of devotion, which fitted him for what he was destined to, more than all the military exercises of that inglorious camp could do.

II. The orders his father gave him to go visit his brethren in the camp. He did not himself ask leave to go, to satisfy his curiosity, or to gain experience and make observations; but his father sent him on a mean and homely errand, which any of his servants might have done, v. 17, 18. David must still be the drudge of the family, though he was to be its greatest ornament. Jesse, we thought, was privy to his being anointed, and yet industriously kept him thus mean and obscure, probably, to hide him from the eye of suspicion and envy, knowing he was anointed to a crown in reversion. He must observe how his brethren fared, whether they were not reduced to short allowance, now that the encampment continued so long. And he must take their pledge, i. e. if they had pawned any thing, he must redeem it; notice their company, so some, observe whom they associate with, and what sort of life they lead; perhaps David, like Joseph, had formerly brought to his father their evil report, and now he sends him to inquire concerning their manners. See the care of pious parents about their children when abroad, especially in places of temptation; they are solicitous how they conduct themselves, and particularly what company they keep. Let children think of this, and conduct themselves accordingly, remembering, that, when from under their parents' eye, they are still under God's eye.

III. David's dutiful obedience to his father's command. He was up early, v. 20. yet would not leave his sheep without a keeper, so faithful was he in a few things, and therefore the fitter to be made ruler over many; and so well had he learned to obey, before he pretended to command. God's providence brought him to the camp very seasonably, v. 21. Both sides were now preparing to fight. Jesse little thought of sending his son to the army, just at that critical juncture, but the wise God orders the times and circumstances, so as to serve his designs of securing the interests of Israel, and advancing the man after his own heart. What articles David brought, he honestly took care of, and left them with those that had the charge of the baggage; but though he had come a long journey with a great load, he ran into the army, to see what was doing there, and to pay his respects to his brethren. Now the armies were drawn out into a line of battle, Goliath appeared first to renew his challenge, vainly imagining he was in the eager chase of his own glory and triumph, whereas he was but courting his own destruction.

1. Saul bids high for a champion. Though he was the tallest of all Israel, and, if he had not been so, while he kept close to God, might himself have safely taken up the gauntlet, yet the Spirit of the Lord being departed from him, he durst not do it, nor press Jonathan to do it. The bold adventurer, if he come off, shall marry the king's daughter, and have a good portion with her: but, as it should seem, whether he come off or no, his father's house shall be free in Israel, from all toll, tribute, custom, and services to the crown; or shall be ennobled, and advanced to the peerage.

2. David is much concerned to assert the honor of God and Israel against the impudent challenge. He asked what reward was promised to him that 15 But David went, and [t] returned from Saul, to feed his father's sheep at Beth-lehem.

Dr. A. Clarke. (15.) Probably David had been appointed Saul's armor-bearer, merely as an honorary distinction, and had never been employed in actual service. (16: 15—23.)—Josephus says, Saul sent him home in the beginning of this war, being contented with the three sons of Jesse who followed him; but it seems more probable, he had returned home some time before: and Josephus had no other authentic information, as to the history of Israel, than we at present possess; so that neither his opinions, nor the traditions he had received from those who lived before him, are of any authority, except when they accord with the sacred Scriptures. The substance thus formed is white, sweet, and a very refreshing substitute for butter or cheese. 29 And David said, [o] What have I now done? Is there not a cause?

30 And he turned from him towards another, and spake after the same * manner: and the people answered him again after the former manner.

[Practical Observations.]

31 ¶ And when the words were heard which David spake, they rehearsed them before Saul; and he † sent for him.

32 And David said to Saul, [p] Let no man's heart fail because of him: [q] thy servant will go, and fight with this Philistine.

33 And Saul said to David, [r] Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: [s] for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth.

34 And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion and a bear, and took a ‡ lamb out of the flock;

35 And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth: and when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard, and [t] smote him, and slew him.

36 Thy servant slew both the lion, and the bear: and [u] this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing [x] he hath defied the armies of the living God.

37 David said moreover, [y] The LORD that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. And Saul said unto David, [z] Go, and the LORD be with thee.

38 ¶ And Saul armed § David with his armor, and he put an helmet of brass upon his head; also he armed him with a coat of mail.

39 And David girded his sword upon his armor, and he assayed to go; for he had not proved it. And David said unto Saul, I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them. And David [a] put them off him.

herd, v. 20. David could appeal to God concerning his humility and sincerity, (Ps. 17: 3.—131: 1.) and at this time gave proofs of both, and yet could not escape this hard character from his own brother. See the folly, absurdity, and wickedness, of a proud and envious passion; how groundless its jealousies are, how unjust its censures, how unfair its representations, how bitter its invectives, and how indecent its language. God, by his grace, keep us from such a spirit!

But it was only a trial of David's meekness, patience, and constancy; a short trial too, and he approved himself well in it: for, (1.) He bore the provocation with admirable temper, v. 29. 'What fault have I committed, for which I should thus be chidden? Is there not a cause for my coming to the camp, when my father sent me? Is there not a cause, for my resenting the injury done to Israel's honor by Goliath's challenge?' This conquest of his own passion was, in some respects, more honorable than that of Goliath. He that hath rule over his own spirit, is better than the mighty. It was no time for David to quarrel with his brother, when the Philistines were upon them. The more threatening the church's enemies are, the more forbearing her friends should be with one another. (2.) He broke through the discouragement with admirable resolution. Those that undertake great and public services, must not think it strange if they be discountenanced and opposed by those from whom they had reason to expect support and assistance; but must humbly go on with their work, in the face not only of their enemies' threats, but of their friends' slights and suspicions.

V. 31—39. David is at length presented to Saul for his champion, (v. 31.) and bravely undertakes to fight the Philistine, v. 32. It would have reflected too much upon the valor of his prince, had he said, Let not thy heart fail; therefore he speaks generally, Let no man's heart fail. David desires a commission from Saul to go and fight with the Philistine, but says nothing of the reward proposed, because that was not the thing he was ambitious of, but only the honor of serving God and his country: nor would he seem to question Saul's generosity.

Two things David had to do with Saul;

I. To get clear of his objection to his undertaking. And, as he had answered his brother's passion with meekness, so here he answered Saul's fear with faith. We have reason to fear Saul had no great acquaintance with, or regard to, the word of God, therefore David, in reasoning with him, argues from experience; though he was but a youth, and never in the wars, yet perhaps he had done as much as the killing of Goliath came to; v. 34—36. and hereby he gives Saul to understand, that he was not so unexperienced in hazardous conflicts, as he took him to be; having killed a lion once, and another time a bear.

1. He tells his story like a man of spirit; he is not ashamed to own that he kept his father's sheep, which his brother had just now upbraided him with; nay, he fetches thence the experience that now animated him. But he lets those about him know he was no ordinary shepherd. Whatever our profession or calling is, be it ever so mean, we should labor to excel in it, and do the business of it in the best manner. When David kept sheep, (1.) He approved himself very careful and tender of his flock, though not his own, but his father's. This temper made him fit to be a king, to whom the lives of his subjects should be dear, and their blood precious, (Ps. 72: 14.) and fit to be a type of Christ, the good Shepherd, who gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom, and who not only ventured, but laid down, his life for the sheep. Thus too was David fit to be an example to ministers, with the utmost care and diligence to watch for souls, that they be not a prey to the roaring lion. (2.) He approved himself very bold and brave in the defence of his flock. This was what he was now concerned to prove, and better evidence could not be demanded than this! 'Thy servant not only rescued the lambs, but, to revenge the injury, slew both the lion and the bear.'

2. He applies his story like a man of faith. He owns (v. 37.) it was the Lord that delivered him

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—30. In human accomplishments, the opposers of the truth of God have frequently possessed an undisputed superiority: (Ez. 15: 6—8. P. O.) confiding in this, they have defied, and still do defy, the advocates of spiritual truth to engage with them; and they dream of a total and decided victory. But they have 'the armies of the living God,' and their invincible Captain Himself, to contend with; and 'who are these uncircumcised Philistines,' that a true Israelite should fear them? Any believer in the divine Savior may predict that their triumphing will be short: and, if fairly called to it, we need not fear to go forth with the plain testimonies of holy Scripture, unadorned by eloquence, and unsupported by human learning, against the most formidable of them; trusting in Him who has all power in heaven and earth. And the hope of being an instrument of good, and of being accepted by the Lord, will animate the faithful servant of God in every undertaking; while the expectation of a reward from man, or the fear of human censure, will be with him a very inferior consideration. SCOTT.

(25, 26.) It does not appear, that Saul consulted the Lord, or offered sacrifice, or even made supplications, on this occasion: but he offered great rewards to him, who should kill Goliath.—To this conduct, David's speech, glowing with confidence in God, zeal for his glory, and indignant resentment of Israel's disgrace, formed a noble contrast. The very inquiry (26) implied the most pointed reproof of the unbelief and cowardice of Saul, and indeed of the whole army.—Free in Israel. (25) Note, Ezra 7: 24—26. SCOTT.

(28.) It can hardly be supposed, that Eliab was entirely ignorant of David's having been anointed by Samuel; and he must have understood this transaction, as at least an indication of his future superiority. (Note, 16: 13.) ID.

Verses 34—37.

Several extraordinary actions of this kind, no doubt, obtained David that great character, with which he had first been introduced to Saul. (16: 18.) SCOTT.

This was likewise from the Lord, who would have it made manifest that his servant fought and conquered by faith, and that the victory was from Him, who works by the most despised means and instruments. 41 And the Philistine came on, and drew near unto David; and the man that bare the shield went before him.

42 And when the Philistine looked about and saw David, [c]he disdained him; for he was but [d]a youth, and ruddy, and of a fair countenance.

43 And the Philistine said unto David, [e]Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And the Philistine [f]cursed David by his gods.

44 And the Philistine said to David, [g]Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field.

45 Then said David to the Philistine, [h]Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield; but I come to thee [i]in the name of the LORD of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast [k]defied.

46 This day [l]will the LORD ‡deliver thee into mine hand, and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee, and I will give the [m]carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth; that [n]all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel.

47 And all this assembly shall know that the LORD [o]saveth not with sword and spear: for [p]the battle is the LORD's, and he will give you into our hands.

48 And it came to pass, when the Philistine arose, and came and drew nigh to meet David, that [q]David hasted and ran toward the army to meet the Philistine.

from the lion and the bear; to Him he gives the praise, and thence he infers, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. Note, Our experiences ought to be improved by us, as our encouragements to trust in God, and venture in the way of duty. He that has delivered, does and will deliver. By the care common Providence takes of the inferior creatures, and the protection they are under, we may be encouraged to depend on that special Providence which surrounds the Israel of God. Paul seems to allude to this of David, 2 Tim. 4: 17, 18. And perhaps David here encouraged himself with the story of Samson; for his slaying a lion was a happy presage of his many illustrious victories over the Philistines in single combat.

Thus David gained a commission to fight the Philistine, with which Saul gave him a hearty good wish, Go, and the Lord be with thee: a good word, if it was not spoken customarily, and in a formal manner, as too often it is.

II. But David has somewhat to do likewise, to get rid of Saul's armor, v. 38. He armed David with his armor; not that he wore himself, the disproportion of stature would not admit that, but some he kept in his armory; little thinking that he, on whom he now put his helmet and coat of mail, must shortly inherit his crown and robe. David being not yet resolved which way to attack his enemy, girded on his sword, not knowing, as yet, but he should have occasion to use it; but he found the armor would but incumber him, and be rather his burden than his defence, therefore he desires leave of Saul to put them off again. I have not proved them, i. e. 'I have never been accustomed to such accoutrements as these.' Those that aim at things above their education and usage, and covet the attire and armor of princes, forget that that is best for us, which we are fit for and accustomed to. 'We cannot go with these;' we had therefore better go without them.

V. 40—47. We are now coming near this famous combat, and have in these vs. the preparations and remonstrances on both sides.

I. The preparations. The Philistine was already fixed, as he had been daily for the last 40 days; well might he go with his armor, for he had sufficiently proved it. Only we are told, (v. 41.) he came on and drew near; a signal, it is likely, being given that his challenge was accepted, and, as if he distrusted his helmet and coat of mail, a man went before him, carrying his shield; for his own hands are full with his sword and spear, v. 45. But what arms and ammunition is David furnished with? Truly none but what he brought with him as a shepherd, v. 40. By this it appeared his confidence was purely in God, not in any sufficiency of his own, and that, now at length, He who put it into his heart to fight the Philistine, put it into his head with what weapons to do it.

II. The conference. 1. With what scorn Goliath looks on his adversary, v. 42. Now he feared the contemptibleness of the champion he contended with would lessen the glory of his victory. He noticed he was but a youth, not come to his strength, ruddy and of a fair countenance, fitter to accompany the virgins of Israel in their dances, (if mixed dancing was then in use,) than to lead on the men of Israel in their battles. He noticed his array with great indignation, v. 43. 'Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? Dost thou think to beat me, as easily as thou dost thy shepherd's dog?' With what confidence he presumed on his success! He cursed David by his gods, imprecating the impotent vengeance of his idols against him, and therefore, in confidence of that, darts his menaces, as if threatening words would kill, v. 44. 'Come to me, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air; it will be a tender and delicate feast for them.' Thus the security and presumption of fools destroy them.

2. How very pious David was. His speech savors nothing of ostentation, but God is all in all in it, v. 45—47. He derives his authority from God, relying on the name of God, as Goliath did on his sword and spear. See Ps. 20: 7.—118: 10, 11. He depends for success on God, v. 46. He speaks with as much assurance as Goliath had done, but on better ground; it is the language of his faith. He devotes the praise and glory of all to God. He did not, like Goliath, seek his own honor, but the honor of God; not doubting but by the success of this action, (1.) All the world should be made to know that there is a God, and that the God of Israel is the one only living and true God, and all other pretended deities vanity and a lie. (2.) All Israel (whom he calls not this army, but this assembly, or church, because they were now religiously attending the goings of their God and King, as they used to do in the sanctuary) all Israel shall know, that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear, (v. 47.) but can, when He pleases, save without either, and against both, Ps. 46: 9. David addresses himself to this combat, rather as a priest going to offer a sacrifice to the justice of God, than as a soldier going to engage an enemy of his country.

V. 48—58. Here is, 1. The engagement between the two champions, v. 48. The Philistine advanced with great state and gravity: if he must encounter a pigmy, yet it shall be with the magnificence of a giant and a grandee. This is intimated in the manner of expression. He arose, and came, and drew nigh, like a stalking mountain, overlaid with brass and iron, to meet David. David advanced with no less activity and cheerfulness, as one that aimed more to do execution, than to make a figure; he hasted, and ran, being lightly clad, to meet the Philistine. We may imagine with what tenderness and compassion the Israelites saw such a pleasing youth as this

'Died. Sic. relates that the Baleares' slingers would even in battle break in pieces shields, helmets, and all kinds of armor.' GILL.

50 So David prevailed over the Philistine with a sling and with a stone, and smote the Philistine, and slew him; [s] but there was no sword in the hand of David.

51 Therefore David ran, and stood upon the Philistine, and took [t] his sword, and drew it out of the sheath thereof, and slew him, and cut off his head therewith. And when the Philistines saw their champion was dead, they [u] fled.

52 And [x] the men of Israel and of Judah arose, and shouted, and pursued the Philistines, until thou come to the [y] valley, and to the gates of Ekron: and the wounded of the Philistines fell down by the way to Shaaraim, even unto Gath, and unto Ekron.

53 And the children of Israel returned from chasing after the Philistines, and [z] they spoiled their tents.

54 ¶ And David [a] took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Jerusalem: but he put his armor in his tent.

55 And when Saul saw David go forth against the Philistine, he said unto Abner, the captain of the host, Abner, [b] Whose son is this youth? And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I cannot tell.

56 And the king said, Inquire thou whose son the stripling is.

57 And as David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, Abner took him, and brought him before Saul, [c] with the head of the Philistine in his hand.

58 And Saul said to him, Whose son art thou, thou young man? And David answered, [d] I am the son of thy servant Jesse, the Bethlehemite.

throwing himself into the mouth of destruction; but he knew Whom he had believed, and for Whom he acted.

2. The fall of Goliath. He was in no haste, because in no fear; confident he should soon at one stroke cleave his adversary's head: but while preparing to do it solemnly, David did his business effectually, without any parade, v. 49. He knew there were famous slingers in Israel, (Judg. 20: 16.) yet was either so forgetful or presumptuous, as to go with the beaver of his helmet open; and thither, to the only part left exposed, not so much David's art, as God's providence, directed the stone. See how frail and uncertain life is, even then when it thinks itself best fortified, and how easily the passage may be opened for life to go out and death to enter. Goliath himself has not power over the spirit to retain the spirit. Let not the strong man glory in his strength, nor the armed man in his armor. See how God resists the proud, and pours contempt on those that bid defiance to Him and his people. None ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered. To complete the execution, he drew Goliath's own sword, a two-handed weapon for David, and with it cut off his head, v. 51. What need had David to take a sword of his own? His enemy's sword shall serve his purpose. God is greatly glorified, when his proud enemies are cut off with their own sword, and He makes their own tongues to fall upon them. David's victory over Goliath was typical of the triumphs of the Son of David over Satan and all the powers of darkness, whom He spoiled, and made a show of them openly; and we through Him are more than conquerors.

3. The defeat of the Philistines' army hereupon. They relied wholly on the strength of their champion, therefore, when they saw him slain, they did not, as Goliath had offered, throw down their arms and surrender themselves servants to Israel, (v. 9.) but took flight, being wholly dispirited, and thinking it to no purpose to oppose one before whom such a mighty man was fallen: they fled, (v. 51.) and this put life into the Israelites; they shouted and pursued them, (v. 52.) David, it is probable, leading them on in the pursuit, even to the gates of their own cities. In their return from the chase, they seized their baggage, plundered their tents, (v. 53.) and enriched themselves with spoil.

4. David's disposal of his trophies, v. 54. He brought the head of the Philistine to Jerusalem, to be a terror to the Jebusites, who held the stronghold of Zion: probably he carried it in triumph to other cities; his armor he laid up in his tent; only the sword was preserved behind the ephod in the tabernacle, as consecrated to God, and a memorial of the victory to his honor, ch. 21: 9.

5. The notice taken of David. Though he had been at court formerly, yet, having been for some time absent, (v. 15.) Saul had forgotten him, being melancholy and mindless, and little thinking his musician should have spirit enough to be his champion; therefore, as if he had never seen him before, he asked whose son he was. Abner was a stranger to him, but brought him to Saul himself: (v. 57.) and he gave a modest account of himself, v. 58. And now he was introduced to the court with much greater advantages than before; in which he owned God's hand performing all things for him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31—58. In the service of our common Lord, we are not all qualified to handle the same weapons, or to fill up the same stations: none should therefore be set up in all things as models, nor ought any of us indiscriminately to imitate the most approved characters. Rules and methods, which are useful and natural to one man, may prove encumbrances to another: and we do best, when we cultivate our own peculiar talent, taking hints from every body, and not attempting exact conformity to any. But faith, and prayer, and truth, and righteousness, 'the whole armor of God,' and 'the mind which was in Christ,' are equally needful for all his servants.—Those who trust in the Lord, and simply seek his glory, shall never be ashamed: in their hands the feeblest means shall be successful, and before them the most formidable opposition shall come to nothing.—Human favor is of small value, for men soon forget those who have been most useful to them; and they alone are happy, who enjoy the favor of Him, who never forgets or forsakes the meanest of his true people.—Finally, in David's victory over the champion of the Philistines, we may see a faint shadow of the Redeemer's victory over Satan, who for ages had defied the armies of the living God, and, from the fall of Adam to the coming of Christ, found no one able in his own strength to stand against him: but Jesus overcame him on his own ground, and foiled him with his own weapons, and still goes on by his despised Gospel to pursue the victory; while all the hosts of the true Israel join in his conquests, and share the benefits; and they shall ere long meet in heaven, to celebrate his triumphs with everlasting songs of praise. Either David, after a time, carried the head of Goliath to Jerusalem, as a terror to the Jebusites; and put his armor in his own tent, until it was removed to the tabernacle of God: (21: 8, 9.) or this is spoken by anticipation; and means, that afterwards Goliath's skull and armor were preserved at Jerusalem, as a monument of the victory, and to the glory of God, in the tent which David there formed for the ark. Verses 55—58.

It has been argued, from the circumstance of Saul's not recollecting David, that the history is inconsistent: and to answer this objection many learned men, by a very unnatural transposition, place this ch. in order of time, before the preceding. But it should be considered that David was young when he went to the court of Saul: and a few years, with change of dress, (from that of a courtier, to that of a shepherd,) make a very great alteration in the appearance of young persons. Kings, especially such kings as Saul, are served by so many fresh faces, that they often literally forget their old acquaintance. Yet it is evident, that Saul had some confused and imperfect recollection of David; though he could not certainly remember whose son he was. (Notes, 1, 15.) SCOTT. See on v. 18. ch. 16. ED.

(55.) 'When a person [in India] has to ask a number of questions, though he know well the name of the individual he has to address, he often begins by asking, "whose son are you." Many people are only known as "the son of" such a person.' ROBERTS.

covenant friend, and the darling of his country. 2. The allays of his triumphs; this vanity accompanies even a right work, that for it a man is envied. So David was. Saul hated him, and sought to kill him. He feared him, and contrived how he might do him some mischief. He proposed to marry his daughter to him; but cheated him of the eldest to provoke him, and gave him the younger, on conditions which would endanger his life. But David performed them bravely, and grew more and more esteemed. Still he is rising, but (as all that aim at the crown of life must expect) he had to grapple with great difficulty and opposition.

V. 1—5. David was anointed to the crown, to take it out of Saul's hand, and over Jonathan's head; and yet here we find,

I. Saul, in possession of the crown, reposed confidence in him, God so ordering it, that he might, by preferment at court, be prepared for future service, v. 2. David having signalized himself above the men of war, in taking up the challenge they declined, Saul set him over the men of war; (v. 5.) not made him general, (Abner was in that post,) but perhaps captain of the life-guard; or, he ordered him, though youngest, to have the precedency, in recompense of his great services. He employed him in the affairs of government; and David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, showing himself as dutiful as he was bold and courageous.

II. Jonathan, who was heir to the crown, entered into covenant with him: God so ordering it, that David's way might be the clearer, when his rival was his friend.

1. Jonathan fell perfectly in love with him, v. 1. Whether it refers to his conference with Saul before the battle, (ch. 17: 34—37.) or to that after, (v. 58.) in which it is probable much more was said than is there set down, is uncertain. But in both David expressed himself with so much prudence, modesty, piety, and felicity, with so much boldness and yet so much sweetness, and all so natural and unaffected, and the more surprising because of the disadvantages of his education and appearance, that the soul of Jonathan was immediately knit unto the soul of David. Jonathan had set upon a Philistine army with the same faith and bravery as David showed in attacking a Philistine giant: so there was between them a very near resemblance of affections, dispositions, and counsels, which made their spirits unite so easily, so quickly, so closely, that they seemed but as one soul in two bodies. None had so much reason to dislike David as Jonathan, yet none regards him more. Those that are governed in their love by principles of wisdom and grace, will not suffer their affections to be alienated by any secular regards or considerations: the greater thoughts will swallow up and overrule the less.

2. He testified his love to David by a generous present, v. 4. a robe, for him as a courtier, and a sword and bow, with either a belt or a sash, as a soldier; and, which made the present much more obliging, they were the same he himself had worn, a presage of what would follow. Saul's he put off, because he would first earn, and then wear them; but now that he had given proofs of the spirit of a prince and soldier, he was not ashamed to wear the habits of one. David is seen in Jonathan's clothes, that all may notice he is Jonathan's second self. Our Lord Jesus thus showed his love to us, stripped Himself to clothe us, emptied Himself to enrich us; nay, more, clothed Himself with our rags, whereas Jonathan did not put on David's.

3. He endeavored to perpetuate his friendship: so entirely satisfied were they in each other, even at first, that they made a covenant, v. 3. Their mutual affection was sincere; and he that bears an honest mind startles not at assurances. True love desires to be constant. Those who love Christ as their own souls, will be willing to join themselves to Him in an everlasting covenant.

III. Both court and country agree to bless him: they seldom agree in their favorites; yet did in David, v. 5. The people cordially loved him, and even Saul's servants could not for shame but caress and compliment him. And it was certainly a great instance of the power of God's grace in David, that he was able to bear all this respect and honor flowing in upon him of a sudden, without being lifted up above measure. Those that climb so fast, have need of good heads and good hearts: it is harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased.

V. 6—11. Now begin David's troubles.

I. He was too much magnified by the common people. Some time after the victory, Saul went a triumphant progress through the cities, next him, to receive the congratulations of the country. But the women, most forward to show respect, v. 6. had got a song, which they sang in their dances, (made by some great admirer of David, more just than wise, in giving his achievements the preference before Saul's,) whose burden was, Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. Such a difference Moses made, between the numbers of Ephraim and Manasseh, Deut. 33: 17.

II. Saul was mightily displeased, and envied David, v. 3, 9. He ought to have considered tha they referred only to this late action, and so did but give David his due. Perhaps the composer only used a poetical license, not intending any invidious comparison; and it was below a great mind to notice such a reflection on his honor, when it appeared that the glory of the public was sincerely intended. But Saul was very wroth, and presently suspected some treasonable design at the bottom of it: What can he have more but the kingdom? This made him eye David, as one he was jealous of, and sought advantages against; (v. 9.) his countenance was not toward him as it had been. Proud men cannot endure to hear any praised but themselves, and think all the honor lost that goes by themselves. It is a sign the Spirit of God is departed from men, if they be peevish in their resentment of affronts, envious and suspicious of all about them, and ill-natured in their conduct; for the wisdom from above makes us quite otherwise.

III. In his fury he aimed to kill David, v. 10, 11. Jealousy is the rage of a man; it made Saul outrageous against David, and impatient to get him out of the way.

l pilas; but none equal to this.' Gill. The author of Anastasius mentions an oath of brotherhood, pledging life for life, as sometimes taken by young men among the modern Greeks: reminding of their ancestors' custom, and also of that of the middle ages. Ed.

(1.) This disinterested friendship was the effect of that grace of God, which produces in all true believers 'one heart and soul,' and causes them to delight in each other's converse and comfort: (1 Pet. 1: 22—25. 1 John 3: 18—15. M. R.) Scott.

(2.) Saul did not at first know David, but soon recollected him. Hence it is manifest, that he had before returned to pastoral employments, but from this time went back no more to them. (17: 55—58.) Id. 'It appears David did not live always at court, but when Saul was well, went to his father's.' Patrick.

(4.) Stripped.] 'This, as I apprehend, was no more than doing a high honor to an inferior, in the eyes of Saul's servants, according to modern eastern custom.' Dodd.—'Presents of clothes or rich robes, as tokens of friendship, are frequent in the east.' Dr. A. Clarke.

Verses 6—9.

After the death of Goliath, and the consequent victory over the Philistines, Saul, and David with him, went to several of the cities of Israel. 'I suppose, Saul and the whole court thought fit to honor David, by accompanying him to Jerusalem when he carried Goliath's head thither.' Patrick. It was the custom of the times, for women to go forth to meet conquerors with instruments of music, singing odes composed on the occasion. (Judg. 11: 34. —Ex. 15: 1, 20, 21. Judg. 5: 1. Ps. 68: 24, 25.) The language of this ode might have given umbrage to a mind less propense to envy and suspicion, than Saul's. Scott.

8 And Saul was very wroth, and [l]the saying [*]displeased him; and he said, They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands: [m]and what can he have more but the kingdom?

9 And Saul [n]eyed David from that day and forward.

10 And it came to pass on the morrow, that [o]the evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he [p]prophesied in the midst of the house; and David [q]played with his hand, as at other times: and there was a javelin in Saul's hand.

11 And Saul [r]cast the javelin; for he said, I will smite David even to the wall with it. [s]And David avoided out of his presence twice.

12 And Saul was [t]afraid of David, because [u]the LORD was with him, and was [v]departed from Saul.

13 Therefore Saul [w]removed him from him, and made him his captain over a thousand; and [x]he went out and came in before the people.

14 And David [†]behaved himself wisely in all his ways; and [z]the LORD was with him.

15 Wherefore when Saul saw that he behaved himself very [a]wisely, he was afraid of him.

1. His fits of frenzy returned upon him. The very next day after he conceived malice against David, the evil spirit from God, that had formerly haunted him, seized him again. Those that indulge themselves in envy and uncharitableness, give place to the devil, and prepare for the re-entry of the unclean spirit, with seven others more wicked. Where envy is, there is confusion. Saul pretended a religious ecstasy; he prophesied in the midst of the house; i. e. he had the gestures and motions of a prophet, and humored the thing well enough to decoy David into a snare, so that he might be fearless of any danger, and off his guard; and, perhaps, designing, if he could but kill him, to impute it to a divine impulse, and to charge it upon the spirit of prophecy, with which he seemed to be animated; but really it was a hellish fury that actuated him.

2. David disdained not, for his master's service, to return to his harp. Let not the highest think any thing below them, whereby they may do good, and be serviceable to those they are obliged to.

3. He took this opportunity to endeavor the death of David, not in a sudden passion, but deliberately: I will smite David to the wall; with such a desperate force did he throw his javelin. Justly does David complain of his enemies, that they hated him with a cruel hatred. No life is thought too precious to be sacrificed to malice. Compare David, with his harp in his hand, aiming to serve Saul; and Saul, with his javelin in his hand, aiming to slay David; and observe the sweetness and usefulness of God's persecuted people, and the brutishness and barbarity of their persecutors. The blood-thirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul.

4. David happily avoided the blow twice, namely, now, and afterwards, ch. 19: 10. not fighting, but flying, for his own preservation, though he had both strength and courage enough, and color of right, to make resistance, and to revenge the injury. David, no doubt, had a watchful eye on Saul's hand, and the javelin in it; yet his safety must be ascribed to the watchful eye of God's providence; and by this narrow escape he seemed designed for something extraordinary.

V. 12—30. I. Saul expresses his malice against David. 1. He was afraid of him, v. 12. Perhaps he pretended to be afraid David would force his way to the crown; but David's withdrawing, (v. 11.) was a plain evidence he was far from such a thought. However, he really stood in awe of him, as Herod feared John, Mark 6: 20. He was sensible he had lost the favorable presence of God himself, and that David had it, and for this reason, he feared him. Note, Those are truly great, and to be reverenced, that have God with them. The more wisely David behaved himself, the more Saul feared him, v. 15. and again, v. 29. Men think, the way to be feared is, to hector and threaten, which makes them feared by fools only, but despised by the wise and good; whereas, the way to be both feared and loved is, to behave ourselves wisely. Wisdom makes the face to shine, and commands respect.

2. He removed him from court, and gave him a regiment in the country, v. 13. that he might be from under his eye, because he hated the sight of him; and that he might not secure the interest of the courtiers. Yet herein he was impolitic; for he gave David an opportunity of ingratiating himself with the people, who therefore loved him, (v. 16.) because he went out and came in before them; that is, he presided in the business of his country, civil as well as military, and gave universal satisfaction.

3. He stirred him up to quarrel with the Philistines, and engage them, (v. 17.) insinuating, that hereby he would do good service to his prince and to his God, and a kindness to himself too; for hereby he would qualify himself for the honor he designed him, which was to marry his eldest daughter. This he had merited by killing Goliath, (ch. 17: 25.) but was so modest, as not to demand it; and now, when Saul proposed it, it was with design of mischief, to make him venture on hazardous attempts, saying in his heart, Let the hand of the Philistines be upon him, hoping they would sometime or other be the death of him,—yet how could he expect this, when he saw God was with him?

4. He did what he could to provoke him to discontent and mutiny, by breaking his promise, and giving his daughter to another, when the time was come she should be given to him, v. 19. This was as great an affront as he could possibly put on him, and touched him both in his honor and in his love: he therefore thought David's resentment would certainly break out in some word or deed, which might give him an advantage to take him off by course of law. Thus evil men seek mischief.

5. Disappointed in this, he proffered his other daughter, (who it seems had a secret kindness for David, v. 20.) but with this design, that she might be a snare to him, v. 21. Perhaps he hoped she would, even after her marriage, take part with her father against her husband, and give the opportunity of doing an unkindness. However, the condition of the marriage, he hoped, would be his destruction; for (so zealous will Saul seem against the Philistines) David must needs kill a hundred of them, and, as proofs that those he had slain were uncircumcised, he must bring their foreskins; this would be a reproach on the Philistines, who hated circumcision, as it was an ordinance of God; and perhaps David, in doing this, would the more exasperate them against him, and make them seek to be revenged on him, which was the thing Saul desired and designed, much more than to be avenged on the Philistines: For Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines, v. 25. See here, (1.) What cheats men have put upon themselves. Saul's conscience would not suffer him, except when the evil spirit was actually upon him, to aim at David's life himself; but he thought that to expose him to the Philistines had nothing bad in it; (v. 17.) whereas the malicious design against him was as truly murder before God, as if he had slain him with his own hands. (2.) What cheats men put upon the world. Saul pretended extraordinary kindness for David, even then when he aimed at his ruin, and was actually plotting it: Thou shalt be my son-in-law, says he, (v. 21.) notwithstanding he hated him implacably. Perhaps David refers to this, when he speaks of his enemy, as one whose words were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart. Probably Saul's employing his servants to persuade David to enter into a treaty of a match with his daughter Michal, (v. 22.) arose from an apprehension, that, either his having cheated him about his elder daughter, (v. 19.) or the hardness of the terms he now proposed would make him decline it.

II. David still conducts himself wisely in all his ways, v. 14, 15. very cautious not to offend; he did not complain of hard measure, nor head a party, but managed all his affairs, as one that made it his business to do real service to his king and country, looking on that to be the end of his preferment. And then the Lord was with him, to give him success in all his undertakings. 1. Though he contracted Saul's ill-will by it, yet he obtained God's favor. Compare this with Ps. 101: 2.

(10. 11.) Saul being under a supernatural though malignant influence, behaved in some respects as the prophets did, when the spirit of inspiration came upon them; yet from a contrary cause. It is not indeed certain whether he assumed this appearance to cloak his attempting to murder David, or whether Satan really wrought upon him till he seemed to prophesy.—David evidently suspected some mischief from the javelin in Saul's hand; and was enabled to avoid the blow, both at this time and on another occasion. Verse 12.

Afraid.] 'I. e. that David would be king in his [Saul's] room.' ASSEMB. ANN.

16 But [b] all Israel and Judah loved David, because he went out and came in before them.

17 ¶ And Saul said to David, Behold, my elder daughter Merab, [c] her will I give thee to wife; only be thou [*] valiant for me, and fight [d] the LORD'S battles: for Saul said, [e] Let not mine hand be upon him, but let the hand of the Philistines be upon him.

18 And David said unto Saul, [f] Who am I? and what is my life, or my father's family in Israel, that I should be son-in-law to the king?

19 But it came to pass, at the time when Merab, Saul's daughter, should have been given to David, that she was given unto [g] Adriel the [h] Mehola-thite to wife.

20 And Michal, Saul's daughter, [i] loved David: and they told Saul, and the thing † pleased him.

21 And Saul said, I will give him her, that she may be [k] a snare to him, and that [l] the hand of the Philistines may be against him. Wherefore Saul said to David, Thou shalt [m] this day be my son-in-law in the one of the twain.

22 And Saul [n] commanded his [o] servants, saying, Commune with David secretly, and say, Behold the king hath delight in thee, and all his servants love thee: now therefore be the king's son-in-law.

23 And Saul's servants spake those words in the ears of David. And David said, Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a king's son-in-law; seeing that I am [p] a poor man, and lightly esteemed?

24 And the servants of Saul told him, saying, ‡ On this manner spake David.

25 And Saul said, Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any [q] dowry, but a hundred [r] foreskins of the Philistines, [s] to be avenged of the king's enemies. But Saul [t] thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines.

26 And when his servants told David these words, it pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law: and [u] the days were not § expired.

27 Wherefore David arose, and went, he and [v] his men, and [x] slew of the Philistines two hundred men; and David brought their foreskins, and they gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son-in-law. And Saul gave him Michal his daughter to wife.

28 And Saul [y] saw and knew that the LORD was with David, and that Michal, Saul's daughter, loved him.

29 And Saul was [z] yet the more afraid of David; and [a] Saul became David's enemy continually.

30 Then the princes of the Philistines [b] went forth: and it came to pass, after they went forth, that David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, so that his name was much set by.

1. When it was proposed to him to be son-in-law to the king, he once and again received the proposal with all possible modesty and humility. When Saul proposed his eldest daughter to him, (v. 18.) he said, Who am I, and what is my life? When the courtiers proposed the younger, he took no notice of the affront Saul had given him in disposing of the elder from him, but continued in the same mind, v. 23. He knew Michal loved him, yet did not offer to improve his interest in her affections, to gain her without her father's consent, but waited till it was proposed to him. And then see, how highly he speaks of the honor offered him. To be son-in-law to the king! Though the king was but an upstart, in his origin as mean as himself, in his management no better than he should be, yet, being a crowned head, he speaks of him and the royal family with all due respect. Note, Religion is so far from teaching us, that it does not allow us, to be rude and unmannerly. We must render honor to whom honor is due. How humbly he speaks of himself. Who am I? This did not proceed from a low, abject, sneaking spirit, for, when there was occasion, he made it appear he had as high a sense of honor as most men; nor was it from his jealousy of Saul, (though he had reason enough to suspect him of evil,) but from his true and deep humility. Who am I? A poor man and lightly esteemed! David had as much reason as any man to value himself. He was of an ancient and honorable family of Judah, a comely person, a great statesman and soldier; his achievements were great; he had won Goliath's head and Michal's heart: he [loved God's will,] knew himself destined by the divine counsels to the throne of Israel, and yet, Who am I, and what is my life? Note, It well becomes us, however God has advanced us, always to have low thoughts of ourselves. He that humbleth himself, shall be exalted. And if David thus magnified the honor of being son-in-law to the king, how should we magnify the honor of being sons (not in law, but in gospel) to the King of kings! Behold what manner of love the Father has bestowed upon us! Who are we, that we should be thus dignified?

3. When the slaying 100 Philistines was made the condition of David's marrying Saul's daughter, he readily closed with it; (v. 26.) and, before the time given for the action expired, doubled the demand, and slew 200, v. 27. As if Saul had meant to consult his honor, he cheerfully undertook it, as became a brave soldier and a true lover, though we may suppose it uneasy to Michal. David hereby discovered likewise, (1.) A great confidence in the divine protection; so that, whatever Saul hoped, David did not fear falling, though he must needs expose himself. (2.) A great zeal for the good of his country, which he would not decline any occasion of serving, though with hazard of life. (3.) A right notion of honor, which consists not so much in being preferred, as in deserving to be so.

4. Even after he was married, he continued his good services to Israel. When the princes of the Philistines began to move towards another war, he was ready to oppose them, and behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, v. 30. The law dispensed with men from going to war the first year after they were married, (Deut. 24: 5.) but David loved his country too well to make use of that dispensation. Many, forward to serve the public, when in pursuit of preferment, have declined it on gaining their point; but David acted from more generous principles.

Lastly, Observe how God brought good to David out of Saul's projects against him. 1. Saul gave him his daughter to be a snare, but she proved a blessing to him. 2. He sent him to fight the battles of the Lord, hoping he would fall by the hand of the Philistines, but he returned victorious. 3. He put him upon desperate adventures, hoping he would perish in them, but he came off with honor. Thus God can bring light out of darkness, and good out of evil.

Saul appears to have been influenced, in this purpose, by fear of exciting a revolt among the people, rather than by the fear of God, or reluctance to commit murder with his own hand. CHAP. XIX.

Saul orders David to be slain. Jonathan informs David; and, pleading for him with Saul, effects a reconciliation, 1—7. David's success in war renders Saul again jealous; he seeks to kill David, who escapes by flight, 8—10. Saul sends to kill him in his house; but Michal favors his escape, and deceives Saul by an image in the bed, 11—17. David goes to Samuel, 18. Saul sends messengers after him to Naioth; and then goes himself; but first his messengers are seized by the Spirit of prophecy, and afterwards he also, 19—24.

AND [a] Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David.

2 But Jonathan, Saul's son, [b] delighted much in David: and [c] Jonathan told David, saying, Saul my father seeketh to kill thee: now therefore, I pray thee, take heed to thyself until the morning, and abide in a secret place, and hide thyself:

3 And I will go out and stand beside my father in the field where thou art, and I will commune with my father of thee; and [d] what I see, that I will tell thee.

4 And Jonathan [e] spake good of David unto Saul his father, and said unto him, Let not the king [f] sin against his servant, against David; because he hath not sinned against thee, and [g] because his works have been to thee-ward very good.

5 For he did [h] put his life in his hand, and [i] slew the Philistine, and the LORD [k] wrought a great salvation for all Israel: thou sawest it, and didst rejoice; wherefore then wilt thou [l] sin against innocent blood, to slay David [m] without a cause?

6 And Saul hearkened unto the voice of Jonathan: and Saul [n] sware, As the LORD liveth, [o] he shall not be slain.

ed a kindness to him, in that his being Saul's son-in-law, made his succeeding him much less invidious, especially when so many of his sons were slain with him, ch. 31: 2. Saul thought, by putting him on dangerous services, to have him taken off, but that very thing confirmed his interest in the people; for the more he did against the Philistines, the better they loved him, so that his name was much set by, (v. 30.) which would make his coming to the crown the more easy. Thus God makes even the wrath of man to praise Him, and serves his designs of kindness to his own people by it.

CHAP. XIX. Immediately after David's marriage, which should have secured him Saul's affection, we find his troubles coming on him faster than ever, and Saul's enmity to him the cause of all. His death was vowed, and four fair escapes of his are recorded in this ch. Thus God has many ways of preserving his people. Providence is never at a loss.

V. 1—7. Saul and Jonathan appear here in their different characters, with reference to David.

I. Never was an enemy so unreasonably cruel as Saul, v. 1. His projects to take David off had failed; therefore he proclaims him an outlaw, and charges all about him, on their allegiance, to take the first opportunity to kill him. It is strange he was not ashamed thus to avow his malice, when he could give no reason for it; but there is least danger from this undisguised malice. Strange that he who knew how well Jonathan loved him, should expect him to kill David; but he thought, that, as heir to the crown, he must needs be as envious at David as himself. And Providence ordered it thus, that he might befriend David's safety.

II. Never was friend so surprisingly kind as Jonathan. (A friend in need is a friend indeed.) 1. He took care for his present security, by letting him know his danger, v. 2. Jonathan knew not but some of the servants might be either so obsequious to Saul, or so envious at David, as to put Saul's orders into execution, if they could light on David.

2. He took pains to pacify his father, and reconcile him to David. The next morning, he ventured to commune with him concerning David; (v. 3.) not that night, either because he observed Saul to be drunk, and not fit to be spoken to, or because he hoped, that, when he had slept upon it, he would himself revoke the order; or because he could have no opportunity of speaking to him till morning. His intercession for David was (1.) Very prudent, managed with great meekness of wisdom, and he showed himself faithful to his friend by speaking good of him, though in danger of incurring by it his father's displeasure. A rare instance of valuable friendship! He pleads, [1.] The good services David had done to the public, and particularly to Saul, v. 4. by which it appeared he was a favorite of Heaven, and a friend to Israel, as well as a good servant to Saul, so that to order him to be slain, was not only base ingratitude to so good a servant, but a great affront to God, and a great injury to the public. [2.] He pleads his innocency: had he been chargeable with any crime, it had been another matter, but he has not sinned against thee; (v. 4.) his blood is innocent, (v. 5.) and if he be slain, it is without cause. And Jonathan had therefore reason to protest against it, because he could not entail any thing upon his family more pernicious than the guilt of innocent blood. (2.) His intercession, being thus prudent, was prevalent. God inclined Saul to hearken to Jonathan. Note, We must be willing to hear reason, and to take all reproof and good advice even from our inferiors; parents from their own children. How forcible are right words! Saul was, for the present, so far convinced of the unreasonableness of his enmity to David, that, [1.] He recalled the bloody warrant for his execution, v. 6. Whether Saul swore here with due solemnity or no, does not appear; perhaps he did, and it was needed if he did; but, at other times, he swore rashly and profanely, which made the sincerity of this oath justly questionable:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

True religion teaches us to love real excellency; to rejoice in it, though it eclipse our own reputation; and to delight in the society of those whom the Lord loves and honors, who bear his image and are zealous for his glory, regardless of inferiority of station, or selfish considerations. This union of souls, resulting from participation of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, prepares men for filling up their several stations in the church of God, in harmony, sympathy, and love, as the several members do in the natural body; and, when it shall be perfected in heaven, will for ever exclude envy and discontent, and render the felicity of each favored inhabitant an accession to the joy of all the rest. (Cor. 12: 12—31.) But how different is the nature of fallen man! When the Lord is provoked to leave us, and Satan is permitted to excite our propensities, we become capable of envying and hating those especially who are most amiable, and who have done the most to serve us, with malignity proportioned to their meekness and wisdom; the commendations bestowed upon them are considered as an injury and reproach to us; and even the peculiar favor of God for them will greatly aggravate malice and envy, and incite to revenge.—For every great and good work a man must expect to be envied by his neighbor: no distinction or pre-eminence can be so unexceptionably obtained, but it will expose the possessor to slander and malice, and perhaps to the most fatal consequences. But such trials are very useful to those who love God, both to prepare them for those stations in which they are to be employed, and to open their way to them: for in due time modest merit will shine forth with double lustre. But humility, industry, faithfulness, silence under injuries, and a backwardness to seek great things for ourselves, are requisite to safety and comfort in the public scenes of life; and retired stations are far more favorable to our own inward peace. Lavish commendations of those whom we love and admire, in such a world as this, often prove a real injury: and in all cases every thing should be avoided, which can excite envy or opposition; except the performance of our duty to God and man.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1—3. (Notes, 18: 1, 3, 4, 28—30.) As Saul doubtless knew, that 'Jonathan delighted much in David,' it must be ascribed to a peculiar interposition of Providence, that he did not attempt to conceal his designs from him. (M. R.)

SCOTT.

(1.) 'Nothing less than the special interposition of God could have saved David's life, when every officer about the king's person, and every soldier had positive orders to despatch him.'

Verses 4—7.

(M. R.—17: 42—53. Ps. 25: 2, 3. John 15: 22—25.) David could not indeed greatly confide in Saul's assurances; but he was willing to keep in the way of his duty, and to put his trust in God.

SCOTT.

7 And Jonathan called David, and Jonathan showed him all those things: and Jonathan brought David to Saul, and he was in his presence [p] as [*] in times past.

8 ¶ And there was war again: and [q] David went out, and fought with the Philistines, and slew them with a great slaughter; and they fled from † him.

9 And [r] the evil spirit from the LORD was upon Saul, as he sat in his house with his javelin in his hand: and David played with his hand.

10 And Saul [s] sought to smite David even to the wall with the javelin; but [t] he slipped away out of Saul's presence, and he smote the javelin into the wall: and David fled, and escaped that night.

11 Saul also [u] sent messengers unto David's house [v] to watch him, and to slay him in the morning: and Michal, David's wife, told him, saying, If thou save not thy life to-night, to-morrow thou shalt be slain.

12 So Michal [x] let David down through a window: and he went, and fled, and escaped.

13 And Michal took ‡ an image, and laid it in the bed, and put a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster, and covered it with a cloth.

14 And when Saul sent messengers to take David, [y] she said, He is sick.

15 And Saul sent the messengers again to see David, saying, [z] Bring him up to me in the bed, that I may slay him.

16 And when the messengers were come in, behold, there was an image in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster.

17 And Saul said unto Michal, [a] Why hast thou deceived me so, and sent away [b] mine enemy, that he is escaped? And Michal answered Saul, [c] He said unto me, Let me go; [d] why should I kill thee?

18 ¶ So David fled, and escaped, and came [e] to Samuel to Ramah, and told him all that Saul had done to him. And he and Samuel went and dwelt in Naioth.

19 And [f] it was told Saul, saying, Behold, David is at Naioth in Ramah.

for it may be feared that those who can so far jest with an oath, as to make a by-word of it, and prostitute it to a trifle, have not such a due sense of the obligation of it, but that, to serve a turn, they will prostitute it to a lie. Some suspect he had a malicious design to bring David within his reach again, intending, the first opportunity, to slay him: but as bad as Saul was, we can scarcely think so ill of him; and therefore we suppose he spake as he thought, for the present, but the convictions soon wore off, and his corruptions again prevailed. [2.] He renewed the grant of his place at court, v. 7.

V. 8—10. Here, 1. David continues his good services to his king and country. Those that are ill paid for doing good, must not be weary in well-doing, remembering what a bountiful Benefactor our Heavenly Father is, even to the froward and unthankful.

Notwithstanding Saul's many affronts to David, yet we find him, (1.) As bold as ever in using his sword for his country, v. 8. War broke out again with the Philistines, and he again signalized himself: he charged them with great bravery, and came off victorious, slaying many, and putting the rest to flight (2.) As cheerful as ever in using his harp for the service of his prince, v. 9. An humble, good man will think nothing below him by which he may do good, and will render good for evil; and trust God with his safety, in the way of his duty. See how David was affected when his enemy was sick, Ps. 35: 13, 14. which, perhaps, refers to Saul's sickness.

2. Saul continues his malice against David. He who but the other day had sworn, by his Maker, that he should not be slain, now endeavors to slay him himself: so deceitful and desperately wicked is the heart of man without the grace of God, Jer. 17: 9. David's fresh honors, instead of extinguishing Saul's ill-will to him, and confirming his reconciliation, revived his envy, and exasperated him yet more. And when he indulged this wicked passion, no marvel that the evil spirit came upon him; (v. 9.) when we let the sun go down on our wrath, we give place to the devil, (Eph. 4: 26, 27.) we make room for him and invite him. Discomposures of mind, though helped forward by the agency of Satan, commonly owe their original to men's own sins and follies. Saul's fear and jealousy made him a torment to himself, so that he could not sit in his house without a javelin in his hand, pretending it was for his preservation, but designing it for David's destruction, v. 10. So strong was the devil in him, so strong his own rage and passion. Perhaps he thought, if he had killed him now, he had been excusable both before God and man, as being non compos mentis—not right in his mind, and that it would have been imputed to his distraction. But God cannot be deceived by pretences, however men may be.

(9.) Played with his hand on his harp.] The cut represents a harp from the sculptures on the tombs of the valley of 'Biban el Molook' (the chambers or gates of the kings) near Thebes in Egypt. They, as well as the other Egyptian monuments from which illustrations have been given, are of very remote antiquity, but the exact date of their erection is still a dispute among archæologists—most of whom assign them to an age previous to the exodus. The royal palaces of neighboring nations were, doubtless, supplied with furniture from the country where the arts of life were in the most flourishing state, and all antiquity accords this honor to Egypt; so that the cut may well represent the harp used in Saul's palace, or the one afterwards attuned by the royal psalmist to the praise of the One True God. The other cuts already given from Egyptian monuments, may also well be looked upon as the best illustrations now accessible of the state of the domestic arts in those remote ages. The climate of Egypt, and the excellence of the colors, combine to preserve the vividness of the paintings. ED.

Verses 13—17.

Michal's fidelity to her husband was commendable: nay, if the cause had been more doubtful, it would have been her duty to unite with him, while no harm was intended to Saul, and David merely aimed to preserve his life. Verses 19—24.

(Notes, 2 Kings 1: 9—14. John 7: 31—36, 40—53.)—Probably the other prophets laid aside their upper garments, and Saul's messengers along with them: (M. R.) and in an ecstasy, during the whole day and night, he involuntarily joined in speaking of divine things, or in singing hymns of praise, without any power of executing the base purpose of his journey. After which, finding himself baffled, he probably returned home extremely chagrined, without taking any notice of Samuel.—This second time of Saul being among the prophets was noted, as being indeed more wonderful than the former. (10: 10—13.) SCOTT.

3. God continues his care of David, and still watches over him for good. Saul missed his blow; David was too quick for him and fled, and by a kind providence escaped that night. To these preservations, among others, David often refers in his Psalms, when he speaks of God being his Shield and Buckler, his Rock and Fortress, and delivering his soul from death.

V. 11—17. Here is,

I. Saul's further design of mischief to David. When he had escaped the javelin, supposing he went straight to his own house, as indeed he did, he sent some of his guards after him, to lay wait at the door, and assassinate him in the morning as soon as he stirred out, v. 11. Well might David complain, that his enemies were bloody men. See Ps. 59: 2, 3, 7.

II. David's wonderful deliverance out of this danger through Michal. Saul gave her to be a snare, but she proved his protector and helper; often is the devil out-shot with his own bow. How she came to know his danger, does not appear; perhaps notice was sent her from court, or, rather, she was herself aware of the soldiers about the house, when they were going to bed, though they kept so still and silent, that they said, Who does hear? as David notices in that Psalm, v. 7. She, knowing her father's great indignation at David, soon suspected the design, and bestirred herself for her husband's safety.

1. She got David out of the danger, v. 11, 12. David himself was better versed in fighting than flying, and, had it been lawful, would have easily cleared his house, by dint of sword, from those that haunted it. And now it was, either in his own closet before he went, or in the hiding-place to which he fled, he penned that 59th Psalm, which shows that, in his fright and hurry, his mind was composed, and, in this great danger, his faith strong and fixed on God; and whereas the plot was to slay him in the morning, he speaks there with the greatest assurance, (v. 16.) I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning.

2. She deceived Saul, and those whom he employed to be the instruments of his cruelty, v. 14. She can by no means be justified in telling a lie, and covering it thus with a cheat; God's truth needed not her lie: but she intended hereby to keep Saul in suspense for a while, that David might have time to secure himself, not doubting but those messengers would pursue him, if they found he was gone. The messengers had so much humanity as not to offer him any disturbance, when they heard he was sick; for to them that are in that misery, pity should be shown; but Saul, when he heard it, gave positive orders that he should be brought to him, sick or well, v. 15. It was base and barbarous thus to vow the death of one who, for aught he knew, was dying by the hand of nature. So earnestly did he thirst after his blood, and so greedy was his revenge, that he could not be pleased to see him dead, unless he himself was the death of him; though a while ago he said, Let not mine hand be upon him. Thus, when men give loose to their passions, they grow more and more outrageous. When the messengers were sent again, the cheat was discovered, v. 16. But, by this time, it was to be hoped David was safe, and therefore Michal was not then much concerned at the discovery. Saul chid her for helping David to escape, v. 17. What a base spirit, to expect that, because Michal was his daughter, she must therefore betray her own husband to him unjustly! Those that themselves will be held by no bonds of reason or religion, are ready to think others should as easily break those bonds. But, in answering Saul's chiding, Michal was again false, when she insinuated she would have hindered David's flight, but that he threatened her, He said, Let me go, why should I kill thee? This was a very unjust and unworthy reflection on him, and might confirm Saul in his rage. David was far from being so barbarous a man, and so imperious a husband, so brutish in his resolves, and so haughty in his menaces, as she here represented him. But David suffered both from friends and foes, and so did the Son of David.

V. 18—24. Here is,

I. David's place of refuge. He fled not to Bethlehem, to his relations, or to any of the cities of Israel that had caressed and cried him up, to make an interest in them for his own preservation; but he ran straight to Samuel, and told him all that Saul had done to him, v. 18. 1. Because it was Samuel that had given him assurance of the crown, in which his faith now began to fail; he was ready to say in his haste, (or, in his flight, as some read it, Ps. 116: 11.) 'All men are liars, not only Saul that promised me my life, but Samuel himself that promised me the throne.' In flying to Samuel, he made God his Refuge, trusting in the shadow of his wings; where else can a good man think himself safe? 2. Because Samuel, as a prophet, was best able to advise him what to do. In the Psalm he penned the night before, he had lifted up his prayer to God; and now he takes the first opportunity of waiting on Samuel, to receive direction and instruction from God. If we expect answers of peace to our prayers, we must have our ears open to God's Word. 3. Because with Samuel there was a college of prophets, with whom he might join in praising God, and the pleasure of that would be the greatest relief imaginable in his present distress. And, doubtless, what little pleasure is to be had in this world, they have it, that live a life of communion with God: so David retired in the time of trouble, Ps. 27: 4—6.

II. David's protection in this place. He and Samuel went and dwelt (or lodged) in Naioth, where the school of the prophets was, in Ramah, as in a privileged place, for the Philistines themselves would not disturb that meeting, ch. 10: 10. But Saul, having notice of it by some of his spies, (v. 19.) set officers to seize David, v. 20. When they did not bring him, he sent more; when they returned not, he sent the third time; (v. 21.) and hearing no tidings of these, he went himself, v. 22. It was below the king, to go himself on such an errand, but persecutors will stoop to any thing,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most vehement anger, when excited by real or supposed injuries, may be pacified by concessions, kindness, and continued good behavior: but envious rage is exasperated by excellency of character and conduct, and generally is implacable.—Absolute princes are so seldom opposed in their designs, and so few venture to plead in behalf of those whom they envy and hate, that they often conclude all men to be alike selfish, and ready to execute any lucrative schemes of villany. But that friendship, which is cemented by mutual faith and piety, will influence those, who feel its sacred energy, to renounce their highest temporal interests, and venture the displeasure of their superiors, in pleading the cause of injured worth.—Ungovernable passions easily break through the most solemn oaths, when the fear of God does not possess the heart. A fresh temptation soon rouses the dormant corruption: and, by indulging malignant passions, men give Satan his full advantage, and may be answerable for multiplied murders, without actually perpetrating any.—The servants of God however should keep to their place and duty, though hated for so doing; give honor to their earthly superiors, however they behave; and persevere in their endeavors to 'overcome evil with good.' The Almighty has innumerable methods of protecting them in the most imminent dangers: He can preserve them by the kindness even of those persons, whose conduct deserves marked disapprobation; He can change the hearts, or bind the hands of their enemies, or shame them for a season out of their malicious purposes.—In some instances, a persecutor, by coming among the people of God, has been apprehended, as it were, by converting grace; and, like Saul of Tarsus, has professed and 'preached the faith, that once he sought to destroy:' (Gal. 1: 15—24. Phil. 3: 12—14. 1 Tim. 1: 12—16.) but far more, like king Saul, have for a time been apparently changed, have exercised spiritual gifts, and been numbered among the prophets, whose malice has remained unsubdued, and whose 'last state has been worse than the first.' CHAP. XX.

David consults with Jonathan how to provide for his safety, 1—10. They renew the covenant of friendship, and confirm it by oath, 11—17. They agree on a token, 18—23. David absents himself from the king's table, and is excused by Jonathan, whom Saul abuses and attempts to kill, 24—34. Jonathan shows David his danger, and most affectionately takes leave of him, 35—42.

AND David [a] fled from Naioth in Ramah, and came and said before Jonathan, [b] What have I done? what is mine iniquity? and what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life?

2 And he said unto him, [c] God forbid; thou shalt not die: behold, my father will do nothing, either great or small, but that he will * show it me: and why should my father hide this thing from me? It is not so.

3 And David [d] sware moreover and said; Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes; and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved: but truly, [e] as the LORD liveth and [f] as thy soul liveth, there is [g] but a step between me and death.

4 Then said Jonathan unto David, † Whatsoever thy soul ‡ desireth, I will even do it for thee.

5 And David said unto Jonathan, Behold, to-morrow is the [h] new moon, and I should not fail to sit with the king at meat: but let me go, [i] that I may hide myself in the field unto the third day at even.

6 If thy father at all miss me, then say, David earnestly asked leave of me, that he might run to [k] Beth-lehem his city; for there is a yearly § sacrifice there for all the family.

7 If he say thus, [l] It is well; thy servant shall have peace: but if he be very wroth, then be sure that [m] evil is determined by him.

8 Therefore thou and stick at nothing, to gratify their malice. Saul lays aside all public business to hunt David. But how was David delivered?

1. When the messengers came where David was among the prophets, the Spirit of God came upon them, and they prophesied; i. e. joined the rest in praising God. Thus, (1.) God secured David: either they were put into such an ecstasy they forgot their errand, and never minded David; or they were, for the present, put into so good a frame, that they could not entertain the thought of doing so bad a thing. (2.) He honored the sons of the prophets, and the communion of saints, and showed how He can, when He pleases, awe even the worst of men, by the tokens of his presence in the assemblies of the faithful, and force them to acknowledge, that God is with them of a truth, 1 Cor. 14: 24, 25. And where may the influence of the Spirit be expected, but in the congregations of the saints? (3.) He magnified his power over the spirits of men.

2. Saul himself was likewise seized with the spirit of prophecy, before he came to the place. One would have thought, so bad a man had been in no danger of being turned into a prophet; yet, when God will take this way of protecting David, even Saul prophesies, as did his messengers, v. 23. He stripped off his royal robe and warlike habiliments, as either too fine, or too heavy, for this service, and fell into a trance, as it should seem, or into a rapture, which continued all that day and night. The saints at Damascus were delivered from the rage of the New Testament Saul, by a change wrought on his spirit, but of another nature from this. This was only amazing, but that sanctifying. This was for a day, that for ever. Note, Many have great gifts, and yet no grace; prophesy in Christ's name, and yet are disowned by Him, Mat. 7: 22. Now the proverb recurs, Is Saul among the prophets? See ch. 10: 12. Then it was different from what it had been, but now contrary. He is rejected of God, and actuated by an evil spirit, and yet among the prophets.

CHAP. XX. David, having several times narrowly escaped Saul's fury, begins to consider at last, whether it were not necessary for him to retire into the country, and take up arms in his own defence; but he will not do so daring a thing, without consulting his faithful friend Jonathan: how that was done, and what passed between them, we are told in this chapter, where we have as surprising instances of supernatural love, as we had in the ch. before of unnatural hatred.

V. 1—8. Here, I. David represents his present troubles to Jonathan. While Saul lay bound by his trance at Naioth, David escaped to the court, and got to speak with Jonathan. And it was happy he had such a friend at court, when he had such an enemy on the throne. If there be those that hate and despise us, let us not be disturbed at that, for there are those also that love and respect us; God hath set the one over against the other, and so must we. Now, 1. David appeals to Jonathan concerning his innocency, and desires, if he knew of any just offence he had given his father, he would tell him, that he might humble himself, and beg his pardon, v. 1. 2. He endeavors to convince him, that, notwithstanding his innocency, Saul sought his life. Jonathan, from filial respect to his father, was very loath to believe he designed, or would ever do, so wicked a thing, v. 2. He knew nothing of any such design; and he had usually been made privy to all his counsels. As became a dutiful son, he endeavored to cover his father's shame, as far as was consistent with justice and fidelity to David. Charity is not forward to think evil of any, especially of a parent, 1 Cor. 13: 5. David therefore gives him the assurance of an oath concerning his own danger; swears the peace on Saul, that he was in fear of his life by him, v. 3. And as for Saul's concealing it from Jonathan, it was easy to account for that; he knew the friendship between him and David, and therefore, though in other things he advised with him, yet not in that. None more fit than Jonathan to serve him in every design that was just and honorable; but he knew him to be a man of more virtue, than to be his confidant in so base a design as the murder of David.

II. Jonathan generously offers him his service; (v. 4.) Whatsoever thou desirest, he needed not insert the provision of lawful and honest, (he knew David too well to think he would ask any thing otherwise,) I will even do it for thee. This is true friendship. Thus Christ testifies his love to us, Ask, and it shall be done for you: and we must testify ours to Him, by keeping his commandments.

III. David only desires him to satisfy himself, and then to satisfy him, whether Saul did really design his death or no. Perhaps David proposed this, more for Jonathan's conviction than his own, for he himself was well satisfied.

1. The method of trial he proposes, was very natural, and would certainly discover how Saul stood affected to him. The next two days, Saul was to dine publicly, on occasion of the solemnities of the new moon, when extraordinary sacrifices were offered, and feasts made on the sacrifices. At these solemn feasts, Saul had either all his children to sit with him, and David had a seat as one of them; or all his great officers, and David had a seat as one of them. However it was, David resolved his seat should be empty, (which never used to be at a sacred feast,) those two days, (v. 5.) and he would abscond till the solemnity was over, and put it upon this issue; If Saul admitted an excuse for his absence, he would conclude he was reconciled; but if he resented it, it was easy to conclude he designed him a mischief, since it was certain he did not love him so well as to desire his presence for any other end, than that he might have opportunity to do him mischief, v. 7.

2. The excuse he desires Jonathan to make for his absence, we have reason to think, was true; v. 6. A day of thanksgiving was kept in his father's family, for the comforts they enjoyed, and a prayer, for the continuance of them. By this it appears that the family David was of, was a very religious family, a house that had a church in it.

3. The arguments he uses with Jonathan, to persuade him to this kindness, are very pressing, v. 8. He had entered into a league of friendship with him, at Jonathan's own proposal; (Thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord

9 And Jonathan said, Far be it from thee: for if I knew certainly that evil were determined by my father to come upon thee, then would not I tell it thee?

10 Then said David to Jonathan, Who shall tell me? or what if thy father answer thee roughly?

11 And Jonathan said unto David, Come, and let us go out into the field. And they went out both of them into the field.

12 And Jonathan said unto David, O LORD God of Israel, when I have sounded my father about to-morrow any time, or the third day, behold, if there be good toward David, and I then send not unto thee, and show it thee;

13 The LORD do so and much more to Jonathan: but if it please my father to do thee evil, then I will show it thee, and send thee away, that thou mayest go in peace: and the LORD be with thee, as he hath been with my father.

14 And thou shalt not only while yet I live show me the kindness of the LORD, that I die not:

15 But also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever: no, not when the LORD hath cut off the enemies of David every one from the face of the earth.

16 So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying, Let the LORD even require it at the hand of David's enemies.

17 And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him: for he loved him as he loved his own soul.

18 Then Jonathan said to him, To-morrow is the new moon: and thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty.

19 And when thou hast stayed three days, then thou shalt go down quickly, and come to the place where thou didst hide thyself when the business was in hand, and shalt remain by the stone Ezel.

20 And I will shoot three arrows on the side thereof, as though I shot at a mark.

21 And, behold, I will send a lad, saying, Go, find the arrows. If I expressly say unto the lad, Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them; then come thou: for there is peace to thee, and no hurt; as the LORD liveth.

22 But if I say thus unto the young man, Behold, the arrows are beyond thee; go thy way: for the LORD hath sent thee away.

23 And as touching the matter which thou and I have spoken of, behold, the LORD be between thee and me for ever.

24 So David hid himself in the field: and when the new moon was come, the king sat him down to eat meat.

25 And the king sat upon his seat, as at other times, even upon a seat by the wall: and Jonathan arose, and Abner sat by Saul's side, and David's place was empty.

26 Nevertheless Saul spake not any thing that day: for he thought, Something hath befallen him, he is not clean; surely he is not clean.

27 And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month, that David's place was empty: and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat, neither yesterday, nor to-day?

28 And Jonathan answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Beth-lehem:

29 And he said, Let me go, I pray thee; for our family hath a sacrifice in the city; and my brother, he hath commanded me to be there: and now, if I have found favour in thine eyes, let me get away, I pray thee, and see my brethren. Therefore he cometh not unto the king's table.

30 Then Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman, do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse to thine own confusion, and unto the confusion of thy mother's nakedness?

31 For as long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom. Wherefore now send and fetch him unto me, for he shall surely die.

32 And Jonathan answered Saul his father, and said unto him, Wherefore shall he be slain? what hath he done?

33 And Saul cast a javelin at him to smite him: whereby Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David.

34 So Jonathan arose from the table in fierce anger, and did eat no meat the second day of the month: for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame.

35 And it came to pass in the morning, that Jonathan went out into the field at the time appointed with David, and a little lad with him.

36 And he said unto his lad, Run, find now the arrows which I shoot. And as the lad ran, he shot an arrow beyond him.

37 And when the lad was come to the place of the arrow which Jonathan had shot, Jonathan cried after the lad, and said, Is not the arrow beyond thee?

38 And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, haste, stay not. And Jonathan's lad gathered up the arrows, and came to his master.

39 But the lad knew not any thing: only Jonathan and David knew the matter.

40 And Jonathan gave his artillery unto his lad, and said unto him, Go, carry them to the city.

41 And as soon as the lad was gone, David arose out of a place toward the south, and fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times: and they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded.

42 And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the LORD, saying, The LORD be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed, for ever. And he arose and departed: and Jonathan went into the city.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1, 2. After Saul had sworn not to slay David, (19: 4—7.) it may be supposed he had said no more to Jonathan on that subject; and perhaps Jonathan had not heard of Saul's late violent attempts against David. (Notes, 19: 13—24.) SCOTT.

Verse 8.

'If,' says he, 'I am guilty of any great offence which violates our covenant, such as treason against Saul; slay me thyself, but betray me not to thy father.' This was finely conceived, to touch the tenderest feelings of Jonathan's heart. SCOTT.

with thee,) and his cause was just; otherwise he would not urge him to espouse it. 'If there be iniquity in me, I am so far from desiring or expecting that the covenant between us should bind thee to be a confederate with me in that iniquity, that I freely release thee from it, and wish that thy hand may be first upon me: slay me thyself.' No honest man will urge his friend to do a dishonest thing for his sake.

V. 9—23. Here, I. Jonathan protests his fidelity to David in his distress. Notwithstanding David's strong confidence in Jonathan, yet, because he might fear lest his father's influence, and his own interest, should warp or cool, Jonathan thought it requisite solemnly to renew his professions of friendship to him, v. 9, 11. So he faithfully promises to let him know how, on trial, he found his father affected toward him, and to make the matter neither better nor worse than it was; (v. 12, 13.) thus would he deliver him from the evil, if it were real, and from the fear of evil, if it were but imaginary. For the confirmation of his promise, he appeals to God, 1. As a Witness, v. 12. The strength of his passion made the manner of his speaking concise and abrupt. 2. As a Judge, v. 13. He expresses himself thus solemnly, that David might be abundantly assured of his sincerity. And thus God has confirmed his promises to us, that we might have strong consolation, Heb. 6: 17, 18. Jonathan adds to his protestations his hearty prayer, 'The Lord be with thee, to protect and prosper thee, as He has been formerly with my father, though now He be withdrawn.' This intimates his belief, that David would be in his father's place, and his good wishes, that he might prosper in it better than his father now did.

II. He provides for the entail of the covenant of friendship with David on his posterity, v. 14—16. He engages David to be a friend to his family when he was gone, v. 15. This he spoke from a natural affection he had to his children. It also bespeaks his firm belief of David's advancement, and that it would be in his power to do a kindness or unkindness to his seed; for, in process of time, the Lord would cut off his enemies, Saul himself not excepted. The house of David must likewise be bound to the house of Jonathan from generation to generation, v. 16. Note, True friends cannot but covet to transmit to theirs after them their mutual affections. Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not. He calls it the kindness of the Lord, because the Lord shows such to those whom He takes into covenant with Himself; He is a God to them, and to their seed; they are beloved for their father's sake. He secures it by an imprecation, v. 16. The Lord require it at the hand of David's seed, (for of David himself he had no suspicion,) if they prove so far David's enemies, as to deal wrongfully with the posterity of Jonathan. He feared lest David, or some of his, should hereafter be tempted to do by his seed, as Abimelech had done by the sons of Gideon, Judg. 9: 5. But the reason given (v. 17.) is purely generous, and has nothing of self in it; it was because he loved him as he loved his own soul, therefore he desired he and his might be loved by him. David, though now in disgrace at court, and in distress, was as amiable in the eyes of Jonathan as ever; so pure were the principles on which his friendship was built. Having himself sworn to David, he caused David to swear to him, and (as we read it) to swear again, which David consented to; to swear by his love to him, which he looked upon as a sacred thing. Jonathan's heart was so much upon it, that, when they parted this time, he concludes with a solemn appeal to God, The Lord be between thee and me for ever; (v. 23.) i. e. 'God Himself be Judge between us and our families for ever, if on either side this league of friendship be violated.' It was in remembrance of this covenant, that David was kind to Mephibosheth. 2 Sam. 9: 7.—21: 7. It will be a kindness to ourselves and ours, to secure an interest in those whom God favors, and to make his friends ours.

Verses 12, 13.

Jonathan knew Samuel had anointed David, and believed he would certainly be king: and he had no thoughts of opposing the purpose of God, but rejoiced that so pious and able a person was chosen to reign over Israel; and prayed that the Lord might be with him, as he had been with Saul. For, as it became a dutiful son, he drew a veil over his father's misconduct, and only adverted to his former good management and success. (Notes, 11: 4—15.)—The whole is emphatically the language of strong affection and emotion; and this appears in the broken and interrupted language employed. SCOTT.

(12.) 'There is most evidently something wanting in this v. The Sept. has, "The Lord God of Israel doth know;" the Syr. and Arab. have, is witness; and two of Kennicot's mss. read liveth. Either makes good sense, but the last the best.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—Patrick thinks the clause an exclamation, and the Assemb. Ann. include what follows it in a parenthesis to 'do so,' &c. ED.

Verses 14—17.

It has been very common, in disputed successions, for the reigning prince to clear the title of his own family, by cutting off all competitors: Jonathan therefore prudently proposed to extend the personal covenant, before made with David, to their posterity also. When we consider David's distress, Saul's enmity, and Jonathan's prospects, we can never sufficiently admire the strength of his faith, and the force of his disinterested love. (18: 1. John 15: 12—16.) It is observable that Jonathan did not desire, that the Lord should require it of David or his posterity, if any failure took place, but 'at the hand of David's enemies.' SCOTT.

Verse 19.

It must be supposed, David went to Bethlehem: but the original words seem to intimate, that he should come three days successively, from the place of his retirement to the spot where he and Jonathan had discoursed on the business, in order to learn whether any thing had been discovered. Perhaps he stayed but one day at Bethlehem. ID.

[e] the matter which thou and I have spoken of, behold [h] the LORD be between thee and me for ever.

[Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ So David hid himself in the field: and when the new moon was come, the [i] king sat him down to eat meat.

25 And the king sat upon his seat, [j] as at other times, even upon a seat by the wall: and Jonathan arose, and Abner sat by Saul's side, and David's place was empty.

26 Nevertheless Saul spake not any thing that day: for he thought, Something hath befallen him, [k] he is not clean; surely he is not clean.

27 And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month, that David's place was empty; and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, [l] Wherefore cometh not [m] the son of Jesse to meat, neither yesterday nor to-day?

28 And Jonathan [n] answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Bethlehem:

29 And he said, Let me go, I pray thee; for our family hath a sacrifice in the city; and [o] my brother, he hath commanded me to be there: and now, if I have found favor in thine eyes, let me get away, I pray thee, and see my brethren: therefore he cometh not unto the king's table.

30 Then [p] Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, [*] Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman, do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse which time he would be returned from Beth-lehem, he must be at such a place, (v. 19.) and Jonathan would come toward that place with his bow and arrows to shoot for diversion; (v. 20.) would send his lad to fetch his arrows, and if they were shot short of the lad, David must take it for a signal of safety, and not be afraid to show his head; (v. 21.) but if he shot beyond the lad, it was a signal of danger, and he must shift for his safety, v. 22. This expedient he fixed upon, lest he should not have the opportunity, which yet it proved he had, of talking with him, and making the report by word of mouth.

V. 24—34. Jonathan is here effectually convinced of that which he was so loath to believe, that his father had an implacable enmity to David, and would certainly be the death of him if it were in his power; and he had like to have paid very dear himself for the conviction.

I. David is missed from the feast on the first day, but nothing is said of him: yet Saul had his heart as full as ever of envy and malice against David. He should first have been reconciled to him, and then come and offered his gift; but, instead of that, he hoped, at this feast, to drink his blood. What an abomination was that sacrifice, which was brought with such a wicked mind as this! Prov. 21: 27. But David's place was empty. It did not use to be so. None more constant than he in attending holy duties; nor had he been absent now, but that he must have come at the peril of his life; and we ought not to throw ourselves into the mouth of danger. Christ Himself absconded often, till He knew his hour was come. But that day Saul took no notice that he missed David, but said within himself, Surely he is not clean, v. 26. He knew what conscience David made of the law, and that he would rather keep away from the holy feast, than come in his uncleanness. Blessed be God, no uncleanness is now a restraint on us, but what we may by faith and repentance be washed from in the Fountain opened, Ps. 26: 6.

II. He is inquired for the second day, v. 27. Saul asked Jonathan, who he knew was his confidant; but he calls him in disdain, the son of Jesse. He asks for him, as if he were not pleased he should be absent from a religious feast: and so it should be an example to masters of families to see to it, that those under their charge be not absent from the worship of God, either in public or in the family. It is a bad thing for us, except in case of necessity, to omit any opportunity of statedly attending on God in solemn ordinances. Thomas lost a sight of Christ, by being once absent from a meeting of the disciples. But what displeased him was, that hereby he missed the opportunity he expected, of doing David a mischief.

III. Jonathan makes his excuse, v. 28, 29. 1. That he was absent upon a good occasion; being sent for by his elder brother, to keep the feast with his relations, for the promotion of brotherly love; and no master would deny a servant liberty to do that at proper times. He pleads, 2. That he did not go without leave, humbly asked and obtained from Jonathan, who, as his superior officer, was proper to be applied to for it. Thus he represents David, as not wanting in any instance of respect and duty to the government.

IV. Saul, hereupon, breaks out into a most extravagant passion, and rages like a tiger disappointed of his prey. David was out of his reach, but he falls upon Jonathan for his sake; (v. 30, 31.) and abuses him shamefully; in effect calls him, 1. A bastard; tells him he was born to the confusion of his mother; i. e. he had given the world cause to suspect he was illegitimate, because he loved him whom Saul hated, and supported him who would be the destruction of their family. 2. A traitor: Thou son of perverse rebellion, so the word is; i. e. 'Thou perverse rebel.' At other times, no counsellor or commander was more trusty and well-beloved; yet now, he represents him as dangerous to his crown and life. 3. A fool: Thou hast chosen the son of Jesse for thy friend, to thine own confusion, for, while he lives, thou shalt never be established. It is probable Saul knew David was anointed to the kingdom, by the same hand that anointed him, and then, not Jonathan, but himself, was the fool, to think to defeat the counsels of God. Yet nothing will serve him but David must die, and Jonathan must fetch him to execution. See how ill Saul's passion looks, and let it warn us against the indulgence of any thing like it in ourselves. Anger is madness, and he that hates his brother, is a murderer.

V. Jonathan is sorely grieved, and put into disorder, by his father's barbarous passion; and the more, because he had hoped better things, v. 2. He was troubled for his father, that he should

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23. Next to the consolations of true religion, nothing is more supporting to an afflicted mind, than the converse of a pious friend: and it is highly desirable to avoid misconstructions of our conduct, by those whom we love and esteem; lest we should lose the comfort of their friendship, and throw temptations in their way.—A clear conscience, an unblemished reputation, and the favor of God, are unspeakable advantages in trying circumstances. (1 Pet. 3: 13—18. 4: 12—16.)—Friendly and pious persons are always backward to suspect others of deep malignity; and pious children will veil the faults of their parents as far as consists with other duties, and truth permits. But it is shameful when parents deliberately devise wickedness, which they must studiously conceal from their children, lest they should in them meet with obstacles to their criminal designs.—At some times it appears to us, 'there is but a step between us and death: at all times we are sensible it may be so, and should be expecting and preparing for that event; 'for, as sure as the LORD liveth, and as our souls now live' in the body, we shall ere long remove into the eternal world.—But let dangers appear ever so imminent, we cannot die, till the purpose of God concerning us be accomplished; and, if we are believers, till 'we have served our generation according to his will.' (Acts 13: 24—37.)—True friendship, grounded on the covenant of the Lord, possesses inconceivable force: it is stronger than death, and able to silence the voice of emulation, ambition, self-love, and even relative affection. Who then can comprehend the love of Jesus, who gave Himself a sacrifice unto God for us rebellious and polluted sinners! And what ought to be the force and effects of our love to Him! SCOTT.

When Saul entered the room, Jonathan arose, and took his seat next to him; and Abner probably, as a near relation of Saul and commander of his forces, sat next to Jonathan.—It must be supposed, that Saul had before this returned to Gibeah, and that the incidents here recorded took place there. SCOTT.

Verse 30.

(M. and M. R.)—Considering Saul's rank, and Jonathan's relation to him, his eminent services and excellent character, and the public and sacred occasion at which it occurred, this speech may give some idea of the furious passions which Saul indulged; as the terms used by him seem to contain the most scurrilous abuse the language afforded. V. 35—42. Here is, 1. Jonathan's faithful performance of his promise to give David notice of the success of his dangerous experiment; which, having done, (v. 35—37.) and finding the coast clear, and no danger of a discovery, he presumed on one minute's personal conversation with David, after he had bid him flee for his life.

2. The most sorrowful parting of these two friends, who, for aught that appears, never came together again but once, and that was by stealth in a wood, ch. 23: 16. (1.) David addressed himself to Jonathan with the reverence of a servant rather than the freedom of a friend, (v. 41.) as one deeply sensible of his obligations to him for the good services he had done him. (2.) They took leave of each other with the greatest affection imaginable, v. 41. The separation of two such faithful friends, was equally grievous to them both, but David's case was the more deplorable: for when Jonathan was returning to his family and friends, David was leaving all his comforts, even those of God's sanctuary, and therefore his grief exceeded Jonathan's; or, perhaps, it was because his temper was more tender, and his passions stronger. (3.) They referred themselves to the covenant of friendship that was between them, both of them comforting themselves with that in this mournful separation. 'We have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord, for ourselves and our heirs, that we and they will be faithful and kind to each other, from generation to generation.' Thus, while we are at home in the body, and absent from the Lord, this is our comfort, that He has made with us an everlasting covenant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24—42. The formal professor is sometimes more constant at divine ordinances, than even the zealous believer: for discomposure of mind will occasionally prevent the attendance of a believer; while the purpose or the practice of the vilest crimes does not interrupt those, who trust in the mere external observance.—When envious and angry passions are indulged, men are pushed on by Satan into the most indecent excesses, without respect even to character, or the most sacred obligations: nor are they, at one moment, aware of the outrages, which they shall commit the next. Let us then fear giving place to the devil in the smallest degree.—Under great provocations, the meekest cannot always refrain from anger; but when its emotions are felt, it is our wisdom to withdraw in silence: and it is generous, to be more grieved for our insulted friends, than for ourselves.—Every comfort on earth is counterpoised with some sorrow; and the dearest friends must experience the most painful separations. But Christians need not, and should not, 'sorrow as men without hope:' for, being one with Christ, they are one with each other; and will soon meet in his presence to part no more, where all tears shall be wiped from their eyes. SCOTT.

Verses 32—34.

(M. R.) When Jonathan had before reasoned with Saul, he was reduced to a better temper; but now he would not hearken to a word: and though, in order to induce Jonathan's concurrence in killing David, he professed a great zeal for his establishment in the kingdom; yet when his purposes were opposed, he madly attempted to kill Jonathan also!—He seems to have used a javelin instead of a sceptre; for he had it always ready at hand. SCOTT.

It has been suggested, that the words of these verses do not mean, that Saul cast a javelin at Jonathan; but only that 'he had cast a javelin' at David, which Jonathan at this crisis recollected. It must, however, be admitted, that this is by no means an obvious construction of the original. Nor can it be readily thought, that merely a recollection of a fact which formerly had taken place, could induce Jonathan to leave his place 'in fierce anger;' when he had, at this time, borne the most provoking language of his father without expressing any indignant perturbation; and had also, subsequent to some of Saul's attempts on David's life, calmly expostulated with Saul, and induced him to engage, by a solemn oath, that he would not slay David. (19: 4—7.)—But the atrocity of such an attempt on the life of his own son, seems to some persons totally incredible. Yet Saul's stern and rigorous conduct, respecting Jonathan, after he had miraculously prevailed to rescue him and Israel from the greatest straits and disgrace, shows that the self-will and severity of his mind had overcome, even at that favorable crisis, his natural affection. (14: 36—44.) And the transient violence of his furious rage, in attempting to murder his son, on the occasion recorded in these verses, bears no proportion to his subsequent deliberate, impious, and most barbarous murder of the priests, and their wives, and children; because they were supposed to favor David. (Notes, 22: 11—19.) Nor can any thing be deemed too atrocious for a man to commit, whom God had given up, and left, in a kind of desperate madness, under the power of Satan, and of his own passions, till he plunged himself into destruction with his own hands. (28: 6—25. 31: 3—6.) SCOTT.

CHAP. XXI. David has now quite taken leave, both of Saul's court, and camp; has bid farewell to his beloved Jonathan; and henceforward to the end of this book, is looked upon as an outlaw and traitor; we still find him shifting from place to place for his safety, and Saul pursuing him. His troubles are very particularly related, not only to be a key to the Psalms, but that he might be, as other prophets, an example to the saints, in all ages, of suffering affliction, and of patience; and, especially, a type of Christ, who, being anointed to the kingdom, humbled Himself, and was therefore highly exalted: only the example of the suffering Jesus was a copy without a blot, but David's not so; witness the records of this chapter, where we find him, in his flight, imposing, 1. on Ahimelech, the priest, to get victuals and arms, and, 2. on Achish, king of Gath, by feigning himself mad. Justly are troubles called temptations, for many are by them drawn into sin.

V. 1—9. Here, I. David, in distress, flies to the tabernacle of God, now pitched at Nob, supposed to be a city in the tribe of Benjamin. The ark still remained at Kirjath-jearim. Neither Samuel the prophet nor Jonathan the prince could protect him; he therefore has recourse next to Ahimelech the priest. He foresees he must now be an exile, therefore comes to the tabernacle, 1. To take an affecting leave of it, for he knows not when he shall see it again, and nothing will be more afflictive to him in his banishment, than his distance from the house of God, and his restraint from public ordinances, as appears by many of his Psalms. 2. To beg direction from the Lord in the way of duty and safety; his case being difficult and dangerous. That this was his business, appears, ch. 22: 10. where it is said that Ahimelech inquired of the Lord for him, as he had done formerly, v. 15. It is a great comfort to us in a day of trouble, to go to God, to whom we may open our case, and from whom we may ask and expect direction.

II. Ahimelech is surprised to see him in so poor an equipage; and afraid of incurring Saul's displeasure by entertaining him. Why art thou alone? He had some with him, (as appears, Mark 2: 26.) but they were only his servants, not his courtiers as aforetime, when he came to inquire of the Lord. He says, (Ps. 42: 4.) he was wont to go with a multitude; and, having now but two or three with him, Ahimelech might well ask, Why art thou alone? He that was suddenly advanced, is now as soon reduced, and alone like a sparrow on the house-top. Such changes are there in this world, and so uncertain are its smiles!

III. David, under pretence of being sent by Saul on public services, solicits Ahimelech to supply his present wants, v. 2, 3. Here David did not behave like himself; he told Ahimelech a gross untruth. What shall we say to this? The Scripture does not conceal it, and we dare not justify it: it was ill done, and proved of bad consequence, as David afterward confessed with regret, ch. 22: 22. It was needless thus to dissemble, for, had he told the truth, the priest, we may suppose, would have sheltered and relieved him as readily as Samuel did, and would have known the better how to advise him, and inquire of God for him. People should be free with their faithful ministers. David was a man of great faith and courage, yet now both failed him, and he fell thus foully, through fear and cowardice. Had he trusted God aright, he would not have used such a sorry, sinful shift to preserve himself. It is written not for our imitation, no, not in the greatest straits, but for our admonition. Let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall; and let us all pray daily, Lord, lead us not into temptation. Let us all take occasion hence to lament, 1. The weakness and infirmity of good men; the best are imperfect in this world. There may be true grace, where yet there are many failings. 2. The wickedness of bad times, which forces good men into such straits as prove temptations too strong for them. Oppression makes a wise man do foolishly.

(1.) He wanted bread, five loaves, v. 3. Travelling was then troublesome; men generally carried their provisions with them, having little money, and no public houses, else David had not now been to seek for bread. It seems he had known the seed of the righteous begging bread, occasionally, but not constantly, Ps. 37: 25.

The priest objected he had but hallowed bread, shew-bread, which had stood a week on the golden table in the sanctuary, and was taken thence for the use of the priests and their families, v. 4. He thinks, too, the young men might not eat of this bread, unless they had kept continence three days, a thing we never find, (except when the law was first given, Ex. 19: 15.) made the matter of any ceremonial purity or pollution; therefore the priest here seems to be over-nice, not to say, superstitious.

David pleads, that he and the young men, in this case of necessity, might lawfully eat of the hallowed bread, being not only able to answer his terms, but holy, possessing their bodies in sanctification and honor at all times. Poor and pious Israelites were, in effect, priests to God, and rather than be starved, might feed on the bread appropriated to the priests. Believers are spiritual priests, and the offerings of the Lord shall be their inheritance; they eat the bread of their God. He pleads that the bread is in a manner common, now that what was primarily the religious use of it, was over; especially (as our margin reads it) when there is this day other bread (hot, v. 6.) sanctified this day in the vessel, and put in the room of it on the table. This was David's plea, and the Son of David approves it, and shows from it that mercy is to be preferred to sacrifice: that ritual observances must give way to moral duties; and that that may be done in a case of an urgent providential necessity, which may not otherwise. He brings it to justify his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath-day, for which the Pharisees censured them, Mat. 12: 3, 4.

Ahimelech hereupon supplies him; (v. 6.) and some think it was about this he inquired of the Lord, ch. 22: 10. This bread, we may suppose, was the more agreeable to David for its being hallowed, so precious were all sacred things to him. The shew-bread was but twelve loaves in all, yet out of this he gives David five, (v. 3.) though he had no more in the house; but he trusted in Providence.

(2.) He wanted a sword. It was a wonder Jonathan did not furnish him with his, as he had done, ch. 18: 4. However, it happened he had now no weapons with him, the reason of which he pretends to be, because he came away in haste, v. 8. Those that are furnished with the sword of the Spirit, and the shield of faith, cannot be disarmed of them, nor need they, at any time, be at a loss. But the priests, it seems, had no swords;

'Here was a downright lie, aggravated, by its being told only to get a little food; and especially told to a high priest, and at the tabernable of God, and when David was come to inquire of the Lord there; and it was attended with a dreadful consequence, the slaughter of the Lord's priests there, which afterwards lay heavy on David's mind, ch. 22: 22. and is the very sin he is thought to refer to in Ps. 119: 28, 29.' GILL. Let us learn hence, that man must obey God's command expressed in the direct precepts of his Word, and leaving the event to Him who can see the end from the beginning, and permits us not, shortsighted as we are, to do evil, in the expectation of bringing good out of it. Notes, Josh. 2: 4, 5. Rom. 3: 8. Verses 3—6.

Jesus Christ has vindicated David in this matter; which proves that the positive institutions of religion may be dispensed with, when the preservation of life, or any other urgent necessity requires it. (Hos. 6: 6. Matt. 12. 3, 4.) SCOTT.

6 So the priest [*] gave him hallowed bread: for there was no bread there but the shew-bread, that was taken from before the LORD, to put [l] hot bread in the day when it was taken away.

7 Now a certain man of the servants of Saul was there that day, [m] detained before the LORD; and his name was [n] Doeg, an Edomite, the chiefest of [o] the herdmen that belonged to Saul.

8 And David said unto Ahimelech, And is there not here under thine hand spear or sword? for I have neither brought my sword nor my weapons with me, because the king's business required haste.

9 And the priest said, [p] The sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom thou slewest in [q] the valley of Elah, behold, it is here wrapped in a cloth [r] behind the ephod: if thou wilt take that, take it: for there is no other save that here. And David said, There is none like that; give it me.

10 ¶ And David arose, and [s] fled that day for fear of Saul, and went [t] to * Achish the king of Gath.

11 And [u] the servants of Achish said unto him, Is not this David, [v] the king of the land? did they not sing one to another of him in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands?

12 And David [x] laid up these words in his heart, and was [y] sore afraid of Achish the king of Gath.

13 And he [z] changed his behavior before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and † scrabbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard.

14 Then said Achish unto his servants, Lo, ye see the man ‡ is mad: wherefore then have ye brought him to me?

15 Have I need of madmen, that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? shall this fellow come into my house?

the weapons of their warfare were not carnal; there was not a sword to be found about the tabernacle, but the sword of Goliath, which he laid up behind the ephod, as a monument of David's victory over him; probably, David had an eye to that, when he asked the priest to help him with a sword; for that being mentioned, Oh! says he, there is none like that, give it me, v. 9. This he had made trial of, and done execution with; by this it appears he was well grown in strength and stature, that he could wear and wield such a sword as that. God had taught his hands to war, so he could do wonders, Ps. 18: 34. God had graciously given him this sword, as a pledge of his singular favor; and he had gratefully given it back to God, as a token of his thankfulness; and now in his distress it stood him greatly in stead. Note, What we devote to God's praise, and serve Him with, is most likely to redound, one way or other, to our own comfort and benefit. What we gave, we have from Him.

Thus was David well furnished with arms and victuals; but it fell out very unhappily, that one of Saul's servants, Doeg by name, was then attending before the Lord, who proved a base traitor, both to David and to Ahimelech. He was by birth an Edomite; (v. 7.) and though proselyted to the Jewish religion, to get preferment under Saul, yet he retained the ancient and hereditary enmity of Edom to Israel. He was master of the herds, which, perhaps, was then a place of as much honor as master of the horse is now. Some occasion or other he had at this time to wait on the priest, either to be purified from some pollution, or to pay some vow; but whatever his business was, it is said, he was detained before the Lord. He must attend, and could not help it, but he was sick of the service, snuffed at it, and said, What a weariness is it! He would rather have been any where else, and therefore, instead of minding the business he came about, was plotting to do David a mischief, and to be avenged on Ahimelech for detaining him. God's sanctuary could never secure itself from such wolves in sheep's clothing See Gal. 2: 4.

V. 10—15. Here is, 1. David's flight to Achish, king of Gath, v. 10. It should seem that, as, though the Israelites loved him, yet the king of Israel had personal enmity to him, which obliged him to leave his own country; so, though the Philistines hated him, yet the king of Gath had a personal kindness for him, valuing his merit, and, perhaps, the more for his killing Goliath of Gath who, it may be, had been no friend to Achish As afterward, (ch. 27: 2, 3.) so now, Achish would have protected him, but that he feared disobliging his own people by it. God's persecuted people have often found better usage from the Philistines than from Israelites; the king of Judah imprisoned Jeremiah, and the king of Babylon set him at liberty.

2. The disgust the servants of Achish took at his being there, and the complaint of it to Achish, v. 11. Achish, perhaps, had intimated to them,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When in the courts of kings a favorite falls, in general it is very rapidly: for out of fickleness, envy, malice, ambition, or fear, almost every one deserts or opposes him, disregarding the most unsullied reputation, eminent services, or personal obligations. Few conduct themselves in extreme difficulties, without taking some manifestly false step: we should therefore 'watch and pray, that we may not enter into temptation;' and especially seek that strength of faith in God, which may overcome the fear of man.—Ingenious falsehoods often promise present security; but they insure future disgrace and disquietude: and no impositions are more foolish and prejudicial, than those, which some men practise, in seeking counsel and comfort from the ministers of Christ.—In this world we must pass from one danger to another, and often meet with terror where we seek security; and those very honors, of which men are ambitious, and which are most gratifying at the time, expose them to manifold disadvantages and perils: nor can we expect our situation to be better, while the best of characters are so inconsistent and defective. But we may 'trust the LORD at all times;' He will supply our wants, and never forsake us notwithstanding our lamented infirmities: and the more simply we depend on Him and obey Him, the more comfortably and surely we shall walk through this troublesome world, to that 'rest which is reserved for the people of God.' SCOTT.

Either David fled with such precipitation, that he had not time to take his armor; or he left it, in order the better to conceal himself. SCOTT.

(9.) Commentators seem afraid that Goliath's sword was too heavy, and so consider that a short one which was in fact preferred. But David, we are to remember, was no longer a mere youth. ED.

Verses 10—15.

David expected Saul would pursue him into every part of the land of Israel, and he was not disposed to form a party against him. Perhaps Achish deemed it politic to draw off so able a commander from the service of Saul, and had given him some intimations that he would protect him. But his officers thought otherwise: and judging it impossible to fix him in their interest, perhaps intimated that he should be put to death. (29: 4—6.) This so alarmed David that he feigned himself mad, and mimicked the actions of lunatics; which gave Achish the opportunity of sending him away, without either employing or hurting him: but it is not certain, whether he really thought him mad, or was willing to avail himself of appearances, to get out of the difficulty.—David's conduct was, in some respects, degrading to his character, and discovers a wavering in his faith and courage. He soon, however, recovered his confidence and composure. (Ps. 34: title. 4—6. 56: title. 1—4.) SCOTT.

(13.) 'Some excuse this, in David. But I see little difference between speaking and doing what is false, seeing both are contrary to truth, and the one a real, as the other a verbal lie, especially when there is in both an intention to deceive. And though David's end was good, viz. to save his life; yet this cannot justify his using unlawful means.' Assemb. Ann.—'This action of David's proceeded from want of faith in God's promises and providence; as such it is not to be imitated by Christians, who are not willing to do any thing unbecoming their profession, even to avoid the greatest dangers,' Bp. WILSON referred to in Hewlett.—'Some suppose David was so terrified, that he was thrown into a kind of frenzy, accompanied with epileptic fits, and this opinion is countenanced by the Sept. It is worthy of remark, too, that the spittle falling down upon the beard, is a genuine concomitant of an epileptic fit. This view of the case would set the conduct of David in a clearer point of light than our translation does.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Dumont.* 'The 34th and 57th Psalms, composed on this occasion, thanking God that He had preserved him from guile, strongly indicates that his behavior was the effect of God's afflicting hand.' Sut. COND. CHAP. XXII.

David escapes to Adullam, whither his kindred and others resort to him, 1, 2. At Mizpeh he commends his parents to the protection of the king of Moab, 3, 4. Admonished by the prophet Gad, he returns to the land of Judah, 5. Saul complains that his servants are unfaithful, 6—8. Doeg accuses Ahimelech; who is sent for with the priests, and answers the charge, 9—16. Saul's soldiers refusing to slay the priests at his command, Doeg executes it; and destroys their city with their wives and children, 17—19. Abiathar escapes to David, who blames himself, and assures him of protection, 20—23.

that it would be policy to entertain David, because he was now an enemy to Saul, and he might be hereafter a friend to them; it is common for the outlaws of a nation to be sheltered by its enemies.

3. The fright this put David into. Though he had some reason to confide in Achish, yet, when he perceived the servants of Achish jealous of him, he began to fear Achish would deliver him up to them, and he was sore afraid; (v. 12.) and perhaps he was the more apprehensive of his own danger, when he was thus discovered, because he wore Goliath's sword, which, we may suppose, was well known at Gath. David now learned by experience what he has taught us, that it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes. Men of high degree are a lie, and if we make them our hope, they may prove our fear. It was at this time David penned the 56th Psalm.

4. The course he took to get out of their hands. He feigned himself mad; (v. 13.) he used the gestures and fashions of a natural fool, or one out of his wits; supposing they would be ready enough to believe that the disgrace he was fallen into, and the troubles he was in, had driven him distracted. This dissimulation cannot be justified: it was mean and inconsistent, and therefore not becoming such a man as David: yet it was not a downright lie, but like a stratagem in war, by which he imposed on his enemies for the preservation of his own life. What David did here in pretence, and for his own safety, which made it partly excusable, drunkards do really, and only to gratify a base lust; they make fools of themselves, and change their behavior; their words and actions commonly are either as silly and ridiculous as an idiot's, or as furious and outrageous as a madman's, which has often made me wonder, that ever men of sense and honor should allow themselves in it.

5. His escape by this mean, v. 14, 15. I am inclined to think Achish was aware the delirium was counterfeit, but, being desirous to protect David, as we find afterward he was very kind to him, even when the lords of the Philistines favored him not, (ch. 28: 1, 2.—29: 6.) he pretended he really thought he was mad, and therefore had reason to question whether it was David or no; or, if it were, they needed not fear any harm he could do, now his reason was departed from him. They suspected Achish was inclined to entertain him; 'Not I,' says he, 'he is a madman, I'll have nothing to do with him, you need not fear I should employ him, or give him any countenance. But then you shall do him no hurt, for if he be a madman, he is to be pitied.' He therefore drove him away, as it is in the title of Ps. 34. which David penned on this occasion, and an excellent Psalm it is, and shows, he did not change his spirit when he changed his behavior, but even in the greatest difficulties and hurries, his heart was fixed, trusting in the Lord; and he concludes that Psalm with this assurance, that none of them that trust in God shall be desolate, though they may be, as he now was, solitary and distressed; persecuted but not forsaken.

CHAP. XXII. David, being driven from Achish, returns into the land of Israel to be hunted by Saul.

V. 1—5. Here, 1. David shelters himself in the cave of Adullam, v. 1. Whether it was a natural or artificial fastness, does not appear; probably the access to it was so difficult, David thought himself able, with Goliath's sword, to keep it against all the forces of Saul; therefore he waited to see (as he says, v. 3.) what God would do with him. The promise of the kingdom implied a promise of preservation to it, and yet he used proper means for his own safety, else he had tempted God. Perhaps the apostle refers to this instance of David, among others, when he speaks of some of the Old Testament worthies that wandered in deserts, in dens and caves of the earth. It was at this time David penned Ps. 142d. entitled, A prayer when he was in the cave; where he complains that no man would know him, and that refuge failed him, but hopes that shortly the righteous should compass him about.

2. Thither his relations flocked to him, v. 1. to be protected by him, to assist him, and to take their lot with him: Joab and Abishai, and other relations, to suffer and venture with him, in hopes shortly to be advanced with him; as they were. The first three of his worthies were those that first owned him when in this cave, 1 Chron. 11: 15, &c.

3. Here he began to raise forces in his own defence, v. 2. He found, by his late experiments, he could not save himself by flight, and therefore was necessitated to do it by force, wherein he never acted offensively, never offered any violence to his prince, nor gave any disturbance to the peace of the kingdom, but only used his forces as a guard to his own person. But whatever defence his soldiers were to him, they did him no credit, for they were not great men, or rich, or stout, no, nor good; but men in distress, in debt, and discontented, men of broken fortunes and restless spirits, that were put to their shifts, and knew not well what to do with themselves. See what weak instruments God sometimes uses to bring about his purposes. The Son of David is ready to receive distressed souls, that will appoint Him their Captain, and be commanded by Him.

4. He took care to settle his parents in a place of safety; no such place could he find in all Israel, while Saul was so bitterly enraged against him, and all that belonged to him, for his sake; he therefore puts them under the king of Moab's protection, v. 3, 4. Observe here, (1.) With what tender concern he provided for his aged parents. It was not fit they should be exposed, therefore he first finds them a quiet habitation, whatever might become of himself. Let children learn hence to show piety at home, and to requite their parents, (1 Tim. 5: 4.) in every thing consulting their ease and satisfaction, though ever so highly preferred, and ever so much employed. (2.) With what humble faith he expects the issue of his present distress, Till I know what God will do for me. He expresses his hopes modestly, as one that had entirely cast himself on God, and committed his way to Him, expecting a good issue, not from his own arts, or arms, or merits, but from what the wisdom, power, and goodness of God would do for him. Now David's father and mother forsook him, but God did not, Ps. 27: 10.

5. He had the advice of the prophet Gad, who, probably, was one of the sons of the prophets brought up under Samuel, and by him commended to David for his chaplain, or spiritual guide: being a prophet, he would pray for him, and instruct him in the mind of God; and David, though himself a prophet, was glad of his assistance. He advised him to go into the land of Judah, (v. 5.) as one confident of his own innocency, well assured of the divine protection, and desirous, even in his present hard circumstances, to do some service to his tribe and country. Let him not be ashamed to own his own cause, nor decline the succors that would be offered him. Animated by this word, there he determined to appear publicly. Thus are the steps of a good man ordered by the Lord.

V. 6—19. We have seen the progress of David's troubles; now here we have the progress of Saul's wickedness. He seems to have laid aside all other business, and to have devoted himself wholly to the pursuit of David. He heard, at length, by the common fame of the country, that David was discovered, i. e. that he appeared publicly, and enlisted men in his service; and hereupon he called all his servants about him, and sat down under a tree, or grove, in the high place at Gibeah, with his spear in his hand for a sceptre; intimating the force by which he designed to rule, and the present temper of his spirit, or its distemper rather, which was to kill all that stood in his way.

In this bloody court of inquisition,

I. Saul seeks for information against David and Jonathan; (v. 7, 8.) thus he would wreak his malice on two of the best and most excellent men he had about him. He sought David's life, and therefore pretended David sought his, though he could not charge him with any overt act that gave the least umbrage or suspicion. His son Jonathan, too, as he would have it, was confederate with David; but this also was notoriously false. A league of friendship there was between David and Jonathan, but no conspiracy in any evil thing; no mischief to Saul. If Jonathan had agreed, after Saul's death, to resign to David, in compliance with the revealed will of God, that could do no harm to Saul. Yet thus the best friends to their prince and country have often been odiously represented as enemies to both; even Christ Himself was so. He takes it for granted Jonathan and David were in a plot against him, and is displeased with his servants that they do not inform him of it, supposing they could not but know it; whereas really there was no such thing. See the nature of a jealous malice, and its pitiful arts to extort discoveries of things that are not. He looks upon all about him as his enemies, because they do not just say as he says; he tells them, they are very unwise, and act against the interest both of their tribe, as Benjamites, and of their families; for David, being of Judah, would not honor them, if advanced, nor be able to give such rewards and preferments. He charges them with being unfaithful, and very unkind. He thought to work on their good nature, There is none of you that is so much as sorry for me, or solicitous for me, as some read it. By these reasonings he stirred them up to act vigorously, as the instruments of his malice, that they might take away his suspicions of them.

II. Though he could learn nothing from his servants against David or Jonathan, yet he got information from Doeg, against Ahimelech the priest. And, 1. Doeg himself is evidence against him, v. 9, 10. Perhaps, bad as he was, he would not have given it, had not Saul extorted it, for had he been very forward to it, he would have done it sooner: but now he thinks they must be all deemed traitors, if none of them be accusers, therefore he tells Saul what kindness Ahimelech had showed to David, which he himself happened to be an eye-witness of: all which was true, but not the whole truth; he ought to have told Saul further, that David had made Ahimelech believe he was then going on the king's business; so that what service he did to David, however it proved, was designed in honor to Saul, and this would have justified Ahimelech, whom Saul had in his power, and would have thrown all the blame on David, who was out of his reach.

2. Ahimelech is seized, or summoned rather to appear before the king, and on this indictment he is arraigned. He and all the priests suspected, not being conscious of guilt, and therefore not apprehensive of danger, came all to the king, (v. 11.) none attempted to escape, or to flee to David, as they would have done, had they been as much in his interest as Saul suspected. Saul arraigns him himself with the utmost disdain and indignation; (v. 12.) not so much as calling him by his name, much less giving him his title of distinction. By this it appears he had cast off the fear of God, that he showed no respect to his priests, but took a pleasure in insulting over them. Ahimelech does not demur to the jurisdiction of Saul's court, nor insist on an exemption as a priest, though a high priest, (to which office, that of the judge, or chief magistrate, had not long since been annexed,) but, in things pertaining to the king, lowers himself to a level with common Israelites. Let every soul be subject (even clergymen) to the higher powers.

3. His indictment is read, v. 13. That he, a false traitor, had joined himself with the son of Jesse in a plot to depose and murder the king. See what bad constructions the most innocent actions are liable to; how unsafe they are, that live under a tyrannical government, and what reason we have to be thankful for the happy constitution and administration of the government we are under.

4. He pleads Not guilty; (v. 14, 15.) owns the fact, but denies he did it with any design against the king. He pleads ignorance of any quarrel between Saul and David, and that he really took David to have been as much in favor at court as ever. Observe, He does not plead that David had imposed on him, though really it was so, because he would not proclaim the weakness of so good a man, no not for his own vindication, especially to Saul, who sought all occasions against him; but he insists on the settled reputation David had, as the most faithful of all the servants of Saul; the honor the king had put on him in marrying his daughter to him, the use the king had often made of him, and the trust he had reposed in him; he goes at thy bidding, and is honorable in thy house, therefore any one would think it a meritorious service to the crown, to respect him, so far from apprehending it to be a crime. He pleads, that he had been wont to inquire of God for him, when he was sent by Saul on any expedition, and did it now as innocently as ever. He protests his abhorrence of the thought of being in a plot against the king; 'Be it far from me, I mind my own business, and meddle not with state-matters.' He begs the king's favor, Let him not impute any crime to us; and concludes with a declaration of his innocency, Thy servant knew nothing of all this. Could any man plead with more evidences of sincerity? Had he been tried by a jury of honest Israelites, he had certainly been acquitted, for who can find any fault in him? But,

5. Saul himself gives judgment against him, v. 16. What could be more unjust? Thus to give judgment in his own cause, without any appeal either to judge or prophet, privy-council, or council of war; so fair a plea to overrule and reject without giving any reason, or suffering any attempt to disprove the allegations of it, but purely with a high hand; to pass sentence so hastily and with so much precipitation; taking no time to consider, nor allowing the prisoner any time to move in arrest of judgment; to sentence not only Ahimelech himself, who was the only person accused by

Verses 7, 8.

This language of Saul is very expressive of rage and jealousy. Probably he had heard that Jonathan had made a covenant with David; and, not being able to learn the particulars, he suspected that treason was implied in it. Perhaps Jonathan kept at a greater distance, and was more reserved than before. SCOTT.

Verses 9, 10.

There was no good reason why Doeg should at all mention Ahimelech's conduct, which he knew did not proceed from malice: but if he must report it, he should have declared, how Ahimelech was imposed upon by David, and that he intended to show respect to Saul in that very action. (21: 1—9.) But on the contrary, he spoke as if David came to take Ahimelech's advice about his subsequent proceedings, and as if Ahimelech was joined in a conspiracy with David against Saul; though nothing could be more contrary to the truth than this insinuation! Doeg therefore slandered Ahimelech, and bare false witness against him, though the general charges adduced accorded with facts. (Ex. 20: 16. Matt. 26: 57—62.)—It is observable, that Doeg, after Saul's example, did not deign to call David by his name, but contemptuously spoke of him, as 'the son of Jesse.' 14 Then Ahimelech answered the king, and said, And [x] who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is [y] the king's son-in-law, and [z] goeth at thy bidding, and is honorable in thine house?

15 Did I then begin to inquire of God for him? be it far from me: let not the king impute any thing unto his servant, nor to all the house of my father: [a] for thy servant knew nothing of all this, † less or more.

16 And the king said, [b] Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, [c] thou and all thy father's house.

17 And the king said unto the ‡ footmen that stood about him, Turn and [d] slay the priests of the LORD; because their hand also is with David, and because they knew when he fled, and did not show it to me. But the servants of the king [e] would not put forth their hand to fall upon the priests of the LORD.

18 And the king said to Doeg, Turn thou, and fall upon the priests. And [f] Doeg the Edomite turned, and [g] he fell upon the priests, and slew on that day [h] fourscore and five persons that did wear [i] a linen ephod.

19 And [j] Nob, the city of the priests, smote he with the edge of the sword; both [k] men and women, children and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword.

20 ¶ And [l] one of the sons of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, named Abiathar, [m] escaped, and fled after David.

21 And Abiathar showed David, that Saul had slain the LORD's priests.

22 And David said unto Abiathar, I knew it that day, when Doeg the Edomite was there, that he would surely tell Saul: [n] I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house.

23 Abide thou with me, fear not: for [o] he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life: [p] but with me thou shalt be in safeguard.

Doeg, but all his father's house, against whom nothing was alleged; and finally, to pronounce the sentence in passion, not for the support of justice, but for the gratification of his brutish rage.

6. He issues a warrant, (verbal only,) ordering his footmen to execute his bloody sentence; v. 17. hereby intending further to disgrace the priests. Never was the command of prince more barbarously given; Slay the priests of the Lord. This is spoken with such an air of impiety, as can scarce be paralleled. Had he seemed to forget their sacred office, it had intimated some regret that men of that character should fall under his displeasure; but to call them the priests of the Lord, and then order his footmen to cut their throats, looked as if, on that very account, he hated them. God having rejected him, and ordered another to be anointed in his room, he seems well pleased to avenge himself on the priests of the Lord, since God Himself was out of his reach. What wickedness will not the evil spirit hurry men to, when he gets the dominion! He alleges, in his order, what was utterly false, and unproved to him, that they knew when David fled; whereas they knew nothing of the matter. But they refused, and never was command of prince more honorably disobeyed. Though they might expect to be turned out of their places, if not put to death, for it, yet, come what would, they would not fall on the priests of the Lord; such a reverence had they for their office, and such a conviction of their innocence.

One would have thought the footmen's refusal should have awakened Saul's conscience, but his mind was blinded, and his heart hardened, and if they will not do it, the hands of the witness shall be upon them, Deut. 17: 7. The most bloody tyrants have found instruments of their cruelty as barbarous as themselves; Doeg is no sooner commanded to fall on the priests, than he does it willingly enough, and, meeting with no resistance, slays with his own hand (for aught that appears) on that same day 85 priests of the age of ministration, between 20 and 50, (v. 18.) and perhaps at this time before Saul in their habits, enough (one would think) to satiate the most blood-thirsty; but the horse-leech of persecution still cries, 'Give, give.' Doeg, by Saul's order, no doubt, having murdered the priests, went to their city, and put all to the sword there, (v. 19.) men, women, and children, and the cattle too. Barbarous cruelty, and such as one cannot think of without horror! Strange, it should ever enter the heart of man to be so impious, so inhuman!

We may see in this, 1. The desperate wickedness of Saul, when the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him. Nothing so vile, but they may be hurried to it, who have provoked God to give them up to their heart's lusts. 2. The accomplishment of the threatenings against the house of Eli; for Ahimelech and his family were his descendants. Though Saul was unrighteous in doing this, yet God was righteous in permitting it:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Oppression often forces men into measures, from which they were entirely averse, and deprives the community of the services of its most useful members: yet the Lord amidst all dangers preserves his people for their appointed services. He can promote their good by the meanest instruments; and the Son of David receives all who come to Him, however sinful and miserable: He changes them all into a holy people, and employs them in his service; (Is. 11: 6—9.) and those who would reign with Him, must be contented first to suffer with Him.—True piety increases and purifies natural affection; and teaches men, however occupied or distressed, to be tender of their aged parents; and to be more ready to meet hardship or danger themselves, than to expose them to it.—In all our difficulties, we should wait till we know what 'God will do for us,' guard against excessive fear, venture readily where duty calls us, and, without yielding to resentment or despondency, persevere in looking out for opportunities of usefulness.—The progress of human nature, instigated by Satan's temptations, is from bad to worse with increasing rapidity. And unhappy indeed is it, when persons of unbridled and lawless passions, possess absolute authority.—Let us then bless God for a mild, equitable, and limited government, and study to fill up our places in society consistently with our peculiar advantages: and may the Lord continue them to our remotest posterity, and extend the same to all the nations of the earth!—We may also learn from this narration, that needlessly to report the truth to the disadvantage of others, often springs from malice, and produces mischief; that a partial statement of facts is effectually bearing false witness, and that a generous man is unwilling to repeat the faults of others; even for his own vindication. It is painful to a feeling heart, to occasion evil to others, especially by misconduct. We should likewise consider, that as unexpected bad consequences may arise from our actions, we should learn to walk the more circumspectly; and always to be ready for that stroke, which hurries men into eternity before they are aware. For 'the wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death.' SCOTT.

Verse 13.

Inquired of God, &c.] Saul, by this language, almost in direct terms, charged God Himself with counselling a traitor, by his high priest, how to prevail against his sovereign! (Ec. 9: 1—3. John 12: 9—11.)—As Ahimelech did not deny this part of the charge, it may be concluded to be true, though not mentioned in the narrative. SCOTT.

Verse 18.

The priests did not generally wear the linen ephod, except when actually officiating: but perhaps the whole company was arrayed in sacerdotal garments, as appearing before the king, and as intending thus to show their respect to him. SCOTT.

No doubt they meant to intimidate all the Israelites, from showing the least favor to David. (Ps. 52: title. 1—4.) 'It was excellently said by Justin Martyr, Let us pray that kings and rulers, together with the royal power, may be found having a sober mind.' Patrick. ID.

CHAP. XXIII.

David, inquiring of God by Abiathar, defends Keilah and smites the Philistines, 1—6. Saul purposes to besiege him in Keilah; but the Lord showing David the treachery of the men of Keilah, he flees to Ziph, where Jonathan meets and comforts him, 7—18. The Ziphites inform Saul concerning him, who closely pursues him to Maon; but is called off by an invasion of the Philistines, 19—28. David dwells at En-gedi, 29.

THEN they told David, saying, Behold, the Philistines fight against [a] Keilah, and they [b] rob the threshing-floors.

2 Therefore David [c] inquired of the LORD, saying, Shall I go and smite these Philistines? And the LORD said unto David, Go and smite the Philistines, and save Keilah.

3 And David's men said unto him, [d] Behold, we be afraid here in Judah: how much more then if we come to Keilah, against the armies of the Philistines?

4 Then David inquired of the LORD [e] yet again. And the LORD answered him and said, Arise, go down to Keilah; [f] for I will deliver the Philistines into thine hand.

5 So David and his men went to Keilah, and fought with the Philistines, and brought away their cattle, and smote them with a great slaughter. So David saved the inhabitants of Keilah.

6 And it came to pass, [g] when Abiathar the son of Ahimelech fled to David to Keilah, that he came down with [h] an ephod in his hand.

7 ¶ And it was told Saul that David was come to Keilah. And performing against Eli that, at which the ears of them that heard it, must needs tingle, ch. 3: 11—13. No word of God shall fall to the ground. 3. This may be considered as a great judgment on Israel, and the just punishment of their desiring a king before the time God intended them one. How deplorable the state of religion at this time in Israel! The worst enemy of their nation could not have done them a greater mischief, than Saul had done.

V. 20—23. Here is, 1. The escape of Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech. Probably, when his father went to Saul, he was left to attend the altar, by which means he escaped the first execution, and, before Doeg and his bloodhounds came to Nob, he had intelligence of the danger, and time to shift for his safety. And whither should he go but to David? v. 20. They that suffer for the Son of David, let them commit the keeping of their souls to Him.

2. David's resentment and grief at the melancholy tidings he brought, v. 21, 22. Note, It is a great trouble to a good man, to find himself any way an occasion of the calamities of the church and ministry.

3. The protection he granted Abiathar, v. 23. It is promised to the Son of David, that God will hide Him in the shadow of his hand, and with Him, all that are his, may be sure they shall be in safeguard, Ps. 91: 1. David had now not only a prophet, but a priest, a high priest, with him, to whom he was a blessing, and they to him, and both a happy omen of his success. Yet it appears, (ch. 28: 6.) Saul had a high priest too, for he had a Urim to consult; it is supposed, he preferred Ahitub, the father of Zadok, of the family of Eleazar; (1 Chron. 6: 8.) for even those that hate the power of godliness, yet will not be without the form. It must not be forgotten here, that David at this time penned the 52d Psalm, as appears by its title, wherein he represents Doeg not only as malicious, but false and deceitful: because, though what he said was, for the substance of it, true, yet he put false colors upon it, with a design to do mischief: yet even then, when the priesthood was become as a withered branch, he looks upon himself as a green olive tree in the house of God, v. 8. In this hurry and distraction David was continually in, he yet found both time and a heart for communion with God, and comfort in it.

CHAP. XXIII. Saul, having made himself drunk with the blood of the priests of the Lord, is here seeking David's life, who appears to be doing good, and suffering ill, at the same time.

V. 1—6. Now we find why the prophet Gad (by divine direction, no doubt) ordered David to go into the land of Judah; (ch. 22: 5.) it was, that, since Saul neglected the public safety, he might take care of it, notwithstanding ill treatment; for he must render good for evil, and therein be a type of Him who not only ventured, but laid down his life, for his enemies.

1. Tidings are brought to David, as to the patron and protector of his country's liberties, that the Philistines had made a descent on the city of Keilah, and plundered the country thereabouts, v. 1. Probably the departure of Gad and David from Saul, encouraged them to make this incursion. When princes begin to persecute God's people and ministers, they may expect vexation on all sides. The way for any country to be quiet, is, to let God's church be quiet in it.

2. David's generosity and public-spiritedness. Though he had enough to do, with the little force he had, to secure himself, yet he could not sit still to see his country ravaged; but was willing, to the utmost of his power, to serve Saul and his interests against the common enemy, and bravely abhorred the thought of sacrificing the common welfare to his private revenge. Those are unlike David, who sullenly decline to do good, because they have not been so well considered as their services deserved. David piously inquires of the Lord by the prophet Gad; for it should seem by v. 6. that Abiathar came not to him with the ephod till he was in Keilah. His inquiry is, Shall I go and smite these Philistines? He inquires concerning both the duty, whether he might lawfully act without a commission from Saul; and the event, whether he might safely venture against such a force as the Philistines had, with such a handful of men at his feet, and such a dangerous enemy as Saul, at his back. It is our duty, and will be our ease and comfort, whatever happens, to acknowledge God in all our ways, and to seek direction from Him.

3. God appointed him, once and again, to go against the Philistines, and promised him success, v. 2. His men opposed it, v. 3. Their hearts failed them. To satisfy them therefore, he inquired of the Lord again, and now received, not only a full commission, which would warrant him to fight, though he had no orders from Saul, but also a full assurance of victory, v. 4. This was enough to animate the greatest coward he had.

4. He went, accordingly, against the Philistines, routed them, and rescued Keilah; (v. 5.) and, it should seem, he made a sally into the country of the Philistines, for he carried off their cattle by way of reprisal. Here notice is taken, (v. 6.) that it was while David remained in Keilah, after he had cleared it of the Philistines, that Abiathar came to him with the ephod in his hand, i. e. the high priest's ephod, in which the Urim and Thummim were. It was a great comfort to David, in his banishment, that when he could not go to the house of God, he had some of its choicest treasures brought to him, the high priest, and the breast-plate of judgment.

V. 7—13. Here is, I. Saul contriving within himself the destruction of David, v. 7, 8. One would think, it should have put Saul on considering what honor and dignity should be done to David for his late exploit. But instead of that he catches at it as an opportunity of doing him a mischief. Ungrateful wretch! for ever unworthy to have any service or kindness done him. Well might David complain of his enemies, that they rewarded him evil for good, and that for his love they were his adversaries, Ps. 35: 12.—109: 4. Christ was used thus basely, John 10: 32. But observe, 1. How Saul abused the God of Israel, in making his providence to countenance his malicious designs, and thence promising himself success in them. God hath delivered him into my hand; as if he, who was rejected of God, were, in this instance, owned and favored by Him, and David infatuated. He impiously connects God with his cause, because he thought he had gained one point. Therefore David prays, (Ps. 140: 8.) Grant not, O Lord, the desires of the wicked; further not his wicked device, lest they exalt themselves. We must not think that one smiling providence either justifies an unrighteous cause, or secures its success. 2. How Saul abused the Israel of God, in making them the servants of his malice against David. He called all the people together, to march with all speed to Keilah, pretending to oppose the Philistines, but intending to besiege David and his men; concealing that design, for it is said, (v. 9.) he secretly practised mischief against

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—6. David was at this time an inspired writer of the Holy Scriptures; yet the Lord spoke to him by his prophet, and then by the high priest, for the honor of his own institutions. (M. R. h.)—It is doubtful, whether David at this time inquired of God by the prophet Gad, or by Abiathar. It seems from the text, that Abiathar did not come to him, till he came to Keilah; yet perhaps this only means the neighborhood of that city. SCOTT.

(1.) Then they told David.] 'Or, now they told David, to wit, before he heard of the slaughter of the priests.' MATT. POOLE.—Then.] 'I. e. whilst he abode in the forest of Hareth, ch. 22: 5.' Then beat the clods very fine; make it level, and beat it well down with a pavier's rammer. When this is done, sprinkle afresh with the oil lees, and let it dry. This being done, the mice cannot burrow in it, no grass can grow through it, nor will the rain dissolve the surface, or raise the mud.' Cato De Re Rustica in DR. A. CLARKE.

(2.) 'In most cases, a man with David's wrongs would have joined with the enemies of his country; but he thinks of nothing but succouring Keilah. This is a rare instance of disinterested heroism.' DR. A. CLARKE.

Saul said, [i] God hath delivered him into mine hand: for [j] he is shut in, by entering into a town that hath gates and bars.

8 And Saul called all the people together to war, to go down to Keilah, to besiege David and his men.

9 And David [k] knew that Saul secretly practised mischief against him; and he said to Abiathar the priest, Bring hither the ephod.

10 Then said David, O LORD God of Israel, thy servant hath certainly heard that Saul seeketh to come to Keilah, to [m] destroy the city for my sake.

11 Will the men of Keilah deliver me up into his hand? will Saul come down, as thy servant hath heard? O LORD God of Israel, I beseech thee, tell thy servant. [n] And the LORD said, He will come down.

12 Then said David, Will the men of Keilah [*] deliver me and my men into the hand of Saul? and the LORD said, [o] They will deliver thee up.

13 Then David and his men, which were about [p] six hundred, arose and departed out of Keilah, and went whithersoever they could go. And it was told Saul that David was escaped from Keilah; and he forbare to go forth.

14 And David abode in the wilderness in strong holds, and remained in [q] a mountain in the [r] wilderness of Ziph: and [s] Saul sought him every day; [t] but God delivered him not into his hand.

15 And David saw that Saul was come out to seek his life: and David was in the wilderness of Ziph in a wood.

16 And Jonathan Saul's son arose, and went to David into the wood, and [u] strengthened his hand in God.

17 And he said unto him, [x] Fear not; for the hand of Saul my father [y] shall not find thee: and [z] thou shalt be king over Israel, and [a] I shall be next unto thee: and [b] that also Saul my father knoweth.

18 And [c] they two made a covenant before the LORD. And David abode in the wood, and Jonathan went to his house.

him. Miserable the people, whose prince is a tyrant; for while some are sufferers by his tyranny, others (which is worse) are made instruments of it.

II. David consulting with God concerning his preservation; where his address to God, is, 1. Very solemn and reverent. Twice he calls God, the Lord God of Israel, and thrice himself his servant, v. 10, 11. Those that address God, must know their distance, and whom they are speaking to. 2. Very particular and express. God allows us to be so in our addresses to Him. His representation of the case is so, v. 10. He seems more solicitous for the safety of the city than for his own. Generous souls are thus minded. He indeed inverts the due order of his queries, but God in his answer puts him into method. If he had asked the men (i. e. the magistrates or elders) of Keilah themselves, what they would do in that case, they could not have told him, not knowing their own minds, nor what they should do when it came to the trial, much less which way the superior vote of their council would carry it; or they might have told him they would protect him, and yet afterward have betrayed him; but God could tell him infallibly. Note, God knows all men better than they know themselves, knows their strength, what is in them, and what they will do, if they come into such and such circumstances. He therefore knows not only what will be, but what would be if it were not prevented; therefore He knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and how to render to every man according to his works.

David, thus notified of his danger, quitted Keilah, (v. 13.) his followers increased to 600, not knowing whither he went, but resolving to follow Providence, and put himself under its protection. When Saul heard that David was escaped from Keilah, he forbore to go forth with the body of the army, as he intended, (v. 8.) and resolved to take only his own guards, and go in quest of him. Thus God baffles the design of his people's enemies, and turns their counsels headlong.

V. 14—18. Here is, I. David absconding, v. 14, 15. We must here, 1. Commend his eminent virtues, his humility, modesty, fidelity to his prince, and patient attendance on the providence of his God, that he did not draw up his forces against Saul, fight him in the field, or surprise him by some stratagem, and so avenge his own quarrel and that of the Lord's priests upon him, and put an end to his own troubles, and the calamities of the country under his tyrannical government. No, he makes no such attempt; he keeps God's way, waits God's time, and is content to secure himself in woods and wildernesses, though with some it might seem a reproach to that courage for which he had been famous. But, 2. We must also lament his hard fate, that an innocent man should be thus put in fear of his life; a man of honor thus disgraced, a man of merit thus recompensed for his services, and a man that delighted in the service both of God and his country, thus debarred from both, and wrapped up in obscurity. What shall we say to this? Let it make us think the worse of this world, which often gives such bad treatment to its best men: let it reconcile even great and active men to privacy and restraint, if Providence make that their lot, for it was David's: and let it make us long for that kingdom, where goodness shall for ever be in glory, and holiness in honor, and the righteous shall shine as the sun.

II. Saul hunting him as his implacable enemy. He sought his life every day, so restless and cruel was his malice, v. 14, 15. As it had been from the beginning, it was now, and will be. He that is born after the flesh, persecuteth him that is born after the Spirit.

III. God defending him as his powerful Protector. God delivered him not into his hand, as Saul hoped; (v. 7.) and unless God had delivered him into his hand, he could not prevail against him, John 19: 11.

IV. Jonathan comforting him, as his faithful friend. True friends will find out means to get together; David, it is likely, appointed this interview, and Jonathan observed it, though had it been discovered it might have cost him his life. True friendship will not shrink from danger, but can easily venture; will not shrink from condescension, but can easily exchange a palace for a wood, to serve a friend. The very sight of Jonathan was reviving to David; but besides, he said what was very encouraging.

1. As a pious friend, he directed him to God, the Foundation of his confidence, and the Fountain of his comfort. He strengthened his hand in God. David, though a strong believer, needed the help of his friends, to perfect what was lacking in his faith; and herein Jonathan was helpful to him, by reminding him of God's promise, the holy oil wherewith he was anointed, God's presence with him hitherto, and his many experiences of God's goodness. Thus he strengthened his hands for action, by encouraging his heart, not in the creature, but in God.

2. As a self-denying friend, he takes pleasure in the prospect of David's advancement to that honor which was his own birthright, v. 17. I shall think it preferment enough to be next thee, near thee, though under thee; and will never pretend to be thy rival. Jonathan's resignation to David of his title, would be a great satisfaction to him, and make his way much the more clear. This, he tells him, Saul knew very well; Jonathan having sometimes heard him say as much. Whence it appears, how wicked Saul was, to persecute one whom God favored; and how foolish, in thinking to prevent what God had determined, and would certainly bring to pass.

3. As a constant friend, he renewed his league

Verses 9—13.

The express and repeated answers given to the inquiries, which David made by the high priest, were in fact a divine attestation, that he was appointed to the kingdom. (1—6. Ex. 28: 30. Num. 27: 21.) Probably these were given in an audible voice from some tent, where the ephod was generally placed, and before which the inquiry was made. The prayer which David used, perhaps by the mouth of Abiathar, in inquiring of God, may be considered as an example of the manner in which pious princes conducted that solemn and important concern. 19 ¶ Then came up [d] the Ziphites to Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself with us in strong holds in the wood, in the hill of [e] Hachilah, which is * on the south of † Jeshimon?

20 Now therefore, O king, come down, according to [f] all the desire of thy soul to come down; and [g] our part shall be to deliver him into the king's hand.

21 And Saul said, [h] Blessed be ye of the LORD; for ye have compassion on me.

22 Go, I pray you, prepare yet, and know and see his place where his ‡ haunt is, and who hath seen him there: for it is told me that he dealeth very subtly.

23 See therefore, and [i] take knowledge of all the lurking places where he hideth himself, and come ye again to me with the certainty, and I will go with you: and it shall come to pass, if he be in the land, that [k] I will search him out throughout all [l] the thousands of Judah.

24 And they arose, and went to Ziph before Saul: but David and his men were in the wilderness of [m] Maon, in the plain on [n] the south of Jeshimon.

25 Saul also and his men went to seek him; and they told David: wherefore he came down § into a rock, and abode in the wilderness of Maon. And when Saul heard that, he pursued after David in the wilderness of Maon.

26 And Saul went on this side of the mountain, and David and his men on that side of the mountain: and [o] David made haste to get [p] away for fear of Saul; for Saul and his men compassed David and his men round about to take them.

27 But [r] there came a messenger unto Saul, saying, Haste thee, and come; for [s] the Philistines have ‖ invaded the land.

28 Wherefore Saul returned from pursuing after David, and went against the Philistines: therefore they called that place ¶ Sela-hammahlekoth.

29 And David went up from thence, and dwelt in strong holds at [t] En-gedi.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The prayers of true believers are a barrier against hostile invasions; but persecution brings down the judgments of God on guilty nations. No ill usage should prompt us to revenge ourselves, or prevent us from doing good, as we have opportunity and ability, even when we are sure to meet with ingratitude, and to be exposed to further trouble, by so doing. Thus Jesus lived and died, 'and left us an example that we should follow his steps.'—The more particularly we seek direction from God in fervent prayer, and the more carefully we consult the sacred Scriptures, the safer will be our path.—In difficult circumstances, we shall often find the unbelief of our professed helpers a very discouraging hindrance: but the most effectual way of answering their objections, and securing their assistance, is to refer them to the precepts and promises of God.—No ties of honor, gratitude, or affection, can secure the heart, under powerful temptations: nay, we none of us know how we should act, if assailed by the terrors of impending death, and left without the immediate supports of divine grace. He, who made the human heart, can alone estimate its deceitfulness: we ought not therefore to confide in our own resolutions, or in the assurances of others; but depend on the Lord to guide and keep us: and if we meet with evil treatment, we need not wonder, and ought not to revile or murmur.—The kindness of those friends, whom He raises up where we could least expect them, may well countervail the malice of our enemies, and the ingratitude and fickleness of those whom we have served. And if the converse of one friend can, at one interview, give so much comfort and strength to our hearts; (2 Cor. 7: 5—7.) what may not be expected from the continual supports, and daily visits, and powerful love, of the sinner's Savior, the believer's covenanted Friend? And what will heaven be, where perfect and universal friendship reigns, without interruption, separation, or alloy?—The influence of wickedness, in those who fill exalted stations, widely and fatally diffuses itself among their inferiors, even throughout whole nations. Those therefore who are distinguished by this dangerous pre-eminence, have additional reasons for bridling their passions, and exercising themselves unto godliness; lest they should by their crimes occasion the ruin of multitudes, and thus aggravate their own condemnation.—But we must not expect much comfort in this evil world, which uses the best of men in so base a manner, and which once 'crucified the Lord of glory.' We should therefore study to pass through it as pilgrims; and to leave it, as those who are departing to a better country, that is, a heavenly.

David, in a cave, having Saul entirely in his power, cuts off his skirt, but spares his life, 1—7. He proves his innocency to Saul, 8—15. Saul owns his fault, requires an oath of David, and departs, 16—22.

them immediately, but thus Divine Providence gave David time to shift for himself, though Saul hoped to secure his game more certainly, v. 23.

3. The eminent peril David was now in. Upon intelligence that the Ziphites had betrayed him, he retired from the hill of Hachilah to the wilderness of Maon, (v. 24.) and at this time he penned Ps. 54. as appears by the title, wherein he calls the Ziphites strangers, though Israelites, because they used him barbarously; but he puts himself under the divine protection. 'Behold God is my Helper, and then all shall be well.' Saul, having got intelligence of him, pursued him closely, (v. 25.) till there was but a mountain between them, v. 26. But this mountain was an emblem of the Divine Providence coming between David and the destroyer, like the pillar of cloud between the Israelites and the Egyptians; David was concealed by it, and Saul confounded by it. David now flees as a bird to his mountain, and finds God to him as the shadow of a great rock. Saul hoped to compass him in and his men; but the ground did not prove convenient, and so his design failed. A new name was given to the place, in remembrance of this, v. 28. Sela-hammah-lekoth, the rock of division, because it divided between Saul and David.

4. David's deliverance out of this danger. Providence gave Saul a diversion, when he was just ready to lay hold on him, (v. 27.) Probably, some private interests of his own were at stake, else he would not have noticed it, we have reason to think, from v. 5—8. God's overruling providence, which orders all events, made the Philistines' invasion very serviceable to him. The wisdom of God is never at a loss for ways and means to preserve his people. Saul of Tarsus was converted, just when he was breathing out threatnings and slaughter against the saints of the Lord.

Lastly, David having thus escaped, took shelter in some natural fortresses, in the wilderness of En-gedi. v. 29. i. e. (s) Lightfoot) the wilderness of Judah, in which he penned Ps. 63. which breathes as much pious and devout affection as almost any of his Psalms; for in all places, and in all conditions, he still kept up his communion with God.

CHAP. XXIV. We have hitherto had Saul seeking an opportunity to destroy David, and, to his shame, he could never find it. Here David had a fair opportunity to destroy Saul, but, to his honor, he did not use it; which was as great an instance of God's grace in him, as the preserving of his own life was of God's providence over him.

V. 1—8. Here, I. Saul renews his pursuit of David, v. 1, 2. so soon as he is come home from chasing the Philistines, and resolves to have another thrust at him, as if he had been delivered to do all these abominations. By the frequent incursions of the Philistines, he might have seen how necessary it was to restore David to his place in the army; but so far is he from that, that now, more than ever, he is exasperated against him, and goes in pursuit of him, even upon the rocks of the wild goats, where, one would think, David should not be envied an inhabitation, nor Saul be desirous to disturb him; for what harm could he fear from one no better accommodated? But Saul cannot be easy while David is alive.

II. Providence brings Saul alone into the same cave with David and his men. v. 3. In those countries there were very large caves in the sides of the rocks or mountains, partly natural, but, probably, much enlarged by art, for the sheltering of sheep from the heat of the sun; hence we read of places where the flocks rested at noon, (Cant. 1: 7.) and this cave seems to be spoken of as one of the sheep-cotes. In the sides of this cave David and his men remained; perhaps not the whole 600, but only some few of his particular friends, the rest being disposed of in similar retirements. Saul, passing by, turned in himself alone, not in search of David, but to cover his feet, i. e. to sleep awhile, it being a cool and quiet place, and very refreshing in the heat of the day: probably, he ordered his attendants to march before, reserving only a very few to wait for him at the mouth of the cave.

III. David's servants stir him up to kill Saul, upon so fair an opportunity, v. 4. They remind him that this was the day he had long looked for, and of which God had spoken to him in general when he was anointed to the kingdom, which should end his troubles, and open the passage to his advancement. But see how apt we are to misunderstand, 1. The promises of God. God had assured David he would deliver him from Saul, and his men interpret that as a warrant to destroy Saul. 2. The providences of God; because it was now in his power to kill him, they concluded he might lawfully do it.

IV. David cut off the skirt of his robe, but soon repented that he had done even that, v. 5. It did Saul no real hurt, and served David for a proof that it was in his power to kill him; (v. 11.) yet, it was an affront to Saul's royal dignity, and David wished he had not done it. Note, It is a good thing to have a heart that smites us for sins that seem little; it is a sign conscience is awake and tender, and will be the means of preventing greater sins.

V. He reasons strongly, both with himself and with his servants, against doing Saul any hurt, v. 6, 7. He considers Saul now, not as his enemy, and the only person in the way of his preferment, for then he would be induced to hearken to the temptation, but as God's anointed, i. e. the person whom God has appointed to reign as long as he lived, and who, as such, was under the particular protection of the divine law; and as his master, to whom he was obliged to be faithful. Let servants and subjects learn hence to be dutiful and loyal, whatever hardships are put upon them, 1 Pet. 2: 18. v. 7. He would not only not do this bad thing himself, but would not suffer those about him to do it. Thus did he render good for evil to him, from whom he had received evil for good; and was herein both a type of Christ, who saved his persecutors, and an example to all Christians, not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good.

VI. He follows Saul out of the cave, and though he would not take his life, yet he wisely took the opportunity to slay, if possible, his enmity, by convincing him that he was not such a man as he took him for. 1. He testified that he had an honorable opinion of Saul. He had too much reason to believe that, let him say what he would, Saul would immediately be the death of him, as soon as he saw him, yet he bravely lays aside that jealousy, and thinks Saul so much a man of sense as to hear his reasoning. 2. His behavior was very respectful, he stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself, giving honor to whom honor was due, and teaching us to order ourselves lowly and reverently to all our superiors, even to those that have been most injurious to us.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—3. The manner of Saul's death might have been concealed, had David killed him, till David had taken proper measures to secure himself, and to seize the throne. (Notes, Ps. 57: 142: titles.) SCOTT.

(3.) Cave.] 'Some caves were exceeding large. Strabo mentions one that would contain 4000 men.' PATRICK. Pococke saw one in which 30,000 men once retired to escape bad air. See geographical note on Palestine, Josh. 12: 8.—'The rabbins have invented a curious conceit here to account for Saul's security. "God, foreseeing that Saul would come to this cave, caused a spider to weave her web over the mouth of it; which, when Saul perceived, he took for granted no person had lately been there, and consequently entered it without suspicion. This is a Jewish tradition, and one of the most elegant and instructive in their whole collection.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 4—7.

The Lord intended to give David an opportunity of exercising faith, patience, and generous kindness; of showing the tendency and efficacy of his religious principles, the tenderness of his conscience, and the steadfastness of his loyalty; for the confutation of his accusers, a rebuke to Saul, and an example to all who read it.—He was satisfied with performing his present duty; left his protection and future advancement to God; and deemed it an atrocious offence to 'stretch forth his hand,' to hurt even so wicked a prince as Saul, and in defence of his own life. SCOTT.

7 So David * stayed his servants with these words, and [m] suffered them not to rise against Saul. But Saul rose up out of the cave, and went on his way.

[Practical Observations.]

8 ¶ David also arose afterward, and went out of the cave, and cried after Saul, saying, [n] My lord the king. And when Saul looked behind him, [o] David stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself.

9 And David said to Saul, [p] Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt?

10 Behold, this day thine eyes have seen, how that the LORD had delivered thee to-day into mine hand in the cave: and some [q] bade me kill thee: but mine eye spared thee; and I said, I will not put forth mine hand against my lord; for he is [r] the LORD's anointed.

11 Moreover, [s] my father, see, yea, see the skirt of thy robe in my hand: for in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe, and killed thee not, know thou and see, that there is [t] neither evil nor transgression in mine hand, and I have not sinned against thee: yet [u] thou huntest my soul to take it.

V. 9—15. We have here David's warm and pathetic speech wherein he endeavors to convince Saul, he did him a great wrong in persecuting him thus, and to persuade him therefore to be reconciled.

1. He calls him father; (v. 11.) he was, in particular, his father-in-law For a prince to seek the ruin of any of his good subjects, is as unnatural as for a father to seek the ruin of his own children.

2. He lays the blame of his rage against him on his evil counsellors, v. 9. David had reason enough to think Saul persecuted him purely from his own envy and malice, yet he decently supposes others put him to it. Satan, the great accuser of the brethren, has his agents in all places, and particularly in the courts of those princes that encourage them and give ear to them, who make it their business to represent the people of God as enemies to Cæsar, and hurtful to kings and princes, that, being thus dressed up in bear skins, they may 'be baited.'

3. He solemnly protests his own innocence, v. 11. Perhaps about this time David penned Ps. 7. concerning the business of Cush the Benjamite, i. e. Saul, as some think, wherein he appeals to God, v. 3—5. putting in a parenthesis, with reference to the story of this ch.

4. He produces undeniable evidence, v. 11. 'Had that been true which I am accused of, I had now had thy head in my hand, and not the skirt of thy robe.' To corroborate this evidence, he shows him, (1.) That God's providence had given him an opportunity to do it. The Lord delivered thee, very surprisingly, to-day into mine hand. When Saul had but a very small advantage against David, he cried out, God has delivered him into my hand, (ch. 23: 7.) and resolved to make the best of that advantage; but not so David. (2.) That 12 The [x] LORD judge between me and thee, and the LORD avenge me of thee; but [y] mine hand shall not be upon thee.

13 As saith the proverb of the ancients, [z] Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked; but mine hand shall not be upon thee.

14 After whom is [a] the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue? [b] after a dead dog, [c] after a flea?

15 The LORD therefore [d] be Judge, and judge between me and thee, and see, and plead my cause, and † deliver me out of thine hand.

16 And it came to pass, when David had made an end of speaking these words unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David? And Saul lifted up his voice, and wept.

his counsellors and those about him had earnestly put him on to do it. He had blamed Saul for hearkening to men's words, and justly; 'for,' says he, 'if I had done so, thou hadst not been alive now.' (3.) That it was upon a good principle, he refused to do it, not from fear of Saul's attendants, but from the fear of God. Such a happy command he had of himself, that his nature, in the midst of the greatest provocation, was not suffered to rebel against his principles.

5. He declares it his fixed resolution never to be his own avenger. The Lord avenge me of thee; i. e. 'deliver me out of thy hand; but, whatever comes of it, my hand shall not be upon thee;' (v. 12. and again, v. 13.) as saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked. i. e. (1.) Men's own iniquity will ruin them at last. So some understand it. Give them rope enough, and they will hang themselves. In this sense it comes in very fitly as a reason why his hand should not be upon him. (2.) Bad men will do bad things; according as men's principles and dispositions are, accordingly will their actions be: this suits the connection. If David had been a wicked man, as he was represented, he would have done this wicked thing; but he durst not, because of the fear of God. Or thus: Whatever injuries bad men do us, yet we must not return them; never render railing for railing: though wickedness proceed from the wicked, yet let it not therefore proceed from us by way of retaliation. See Isa. 32: 6—8.

6. He endeavors to convince him, that as it was a bad thing, so it was a mean thing, for him to chase such an inconsiderable person as David was, v. 14. one of his own servants, bred a poor shepherd, now an exile; neither able nor willing to resist. To conquer him would not be to his honor, to attempt it was his disparagement. So far from aspiring, David was, in his own account, as

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. Wicked men are often interrupted in their evil courses; yet they return to them when the restraint is removed, as if delivered from trouble that they might commit more sins. (Jer. 7: 8—11.) But the Lord disappoints their malice; and by bringing them into danger, gives them manifest proof of their folly and wickedness.—An accurate knowledge of the divine law, an established judgment, and a holy state of heart, are requisite to mark out the path of duty, in many important cases. But it is always safe to deny the suggestions of revenge, covetousness, ambition, impatience, or other selfish principles.—We should perform all our relative duties from regard to the authority of GOD; when others violate his law in their conduct towards us, we must not do the same towards them; and in waiting for the performance of his promises, we must use lawful means alone. Under the deepest injuries we are not allowed, and ought not to be inclined, to avenge ourselves; but after the example of David, and of David's Lord, we should 'commit our cause to Him that judgeth righteously.' (1 Pet. 2: 18—25.)—Magistracy is the ordinance of God, and confers dignity on those advanced to it, who, in all ordinary cases and lawful things, should be honored and obeyed; and if they abuse their trust, the Lord will execute vengeance on them: and provided we have the opportunity, we should, along with the most loyal and unreserved submission in all things lawful, plainly warn them of their danger in this respect. If persecuted in one city we may flee to another, and use necessary means of self-preservation: but we must not lift up our hands, or adopt offensive measures, against those whom God has placed over us, though like even Saul or Nero. (Rom. 13: 1—7.) SCOTT.

Verse 8—15.

It may be supposed, David remained at so great a distance from Saul and his army, that he was in no danger of being immediately seized on by them; though Saul could both hear and see him. Yet, if Saul's heart should not be affected by his address, he would be more likely to crush him than before. But this, and all consequences, David trusted with God.—Nothing can be imagined more respectful, pathetic, and forcible, than his conduct and address on this occasion. At the same time he plainly and repeatedly warned Saul, that the Lord would judge between them, and both deliver him out of his hand, and avenge his cause upon him. (Notes, 26: 13—20.) SCOTT.

The imperative or optative mood, employed in these verses, might perhaps, with more strict conformity to the Hebrew, be changed for the future tense indicative:—'The Lord will judge ... will avenge, ... will be Judge, &c.' ID.

(8.) Stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself.] In the peculiar form of oriental salutation of a superior; see the cut of the Persian manner. 'It is only on remarkable occasions that the prostration is made.' MORIER.

Verses 16—22.

These forcible words, and this generous behavior, produced a temporary conviction, in Saul's mind, of David's excellency, the righteousness of his cause, and the certainty of his advancement; and consequently, that himself was deeply criminal, and in a ruinous path. Probably, he was in some measure convinced of these things at other times, but they now more deeply affecting these words unto Saul, that Saul said, [e] Is this thy voice, my son David? and [f] Saul lifted up his voice and wept.

17 And he said to David, [g] Thou art more righteous than I: for [h] thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil.

18 And thou hast showed this day how that thou hast dealt well with me: forasmuch as when [i] the LORD had [*] delivered me into thine hand, thou killedst me not.

19 For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? wherefore, [j] the LORD reward thee good for that thou hast done unto me this day.

20 And now, behold, [k] I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thine hand.

21 [l] Swear now therefore unto me by the LORD, that [m] thou wilt not cut off my seed after me, and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house.

22 And David sware unto Saul, and Saul went home; but [n] David and his men gat them up unto [o] the hold.

CHAP. XXV.

Samuel dies, and is lamented and buried by all Israel; and David goes to Paran, 1. The character of Nabal, and of his wife Abigail, 2, 3. David sends to Nabal, most respectfully requesting some provisions; but, provoked by his answer, sets out to destroy him, 4—13. A servant warns Abigail, 14—17. She meets David with a present, and wisely pacifies him, 18—31. David blesses God for her interposition, and courteously dismisses her, 32—35. Nabal, hearing of the danger to which he had been exposed, is terrified, and dies, 36—38. David marries Abigail and also Ahinoam, 39—43. Michal is given to Phalti 44.

a dead dog; Mephibosheth thus calls himself, 2 Sam. 9: 8. This humble language would have wrought upon Saul, if he had any spark of generosity in him. What credit would it be to Saul to trample on a dead dog? What pleasure to hunt a flea, one flea? so the Heb. Which, (as some have observed,) if it be sought, is not easily found, if it be found, not easily caught, and if it be caught, is a poor prize, especially for a prince.

7. He once and again appeals to God as the righteous Judge, v. 12, 15. Note, The justice of God is the refuge and comfort of oppressed innocence. If men wrong us, God will right us, at furthest, in the judgment of the great day. With Him David leaves his cause, and so rests satisfied, waiting his time to appear for him.

V. 16—22. Here is, I. Saul's penitent reply to David's speech. It was strange he had patience to hear him out, considering how outrageous he was against him, and how cutting David's discourse was: but God restrained him and his men: and we may suppose Saul struck with amazement at the singularity of the event, and much more when he found how much he had lain at David's mercy. His heart must have been harder than a stone, if this had not affected him.

1. He melted into tears; not counterfeit, we may suppose, but real expressions of his present concern at the sight of his own iniquity, so plainly proved upon him. He speaks as one quite overcome with David's kindness; Is this thy voice, my son David? And, as one that relented at the thought of his own folly and ingratitude, he lifted up his voice and wept, v. 16. Many mourn for their sins, that do not truly repent of them; weep bitterly for them, and yet continue in love and league with them.

2. He ingenuously acknowledged David's integrity, and his own iniquity, v. 17. Now God made good to David that word on which he had caused him to hope, that He would bring forth his righteousness as the light, Ps. 37: 6. They who take care to keep a good conscience, may leave it to God to secure them the credit of it. This fair confession was enough to prove David innocent, (even his enemy himself being judge,) but not enough to prove Saul himself a true penitent. He should have said, Thou art righteous, but I am wicked; but the utmost he will own is this, Thou art more righteous than I: bad men will commonly go no further in their confessions. He now owns himself mistaken concerning David, v. 18. We are too apt to suspect others to be worse affected towards us than really they are, and perhaps are proved to be: when, afterward, our mistake is discovered, we should be forward to recall our suspicions, as Saul does here.

3. He prays God to recompense David's generous kindness to him. He owns David's sparing him was an unparalleled instance of tenderness; no man would have done the like; therefore, either because he thought himself not able to give a full recompense, or, because he found himself not inclined to give any at all, he turns him over to God for his pay; The Lord reward thee good, v. 19. Poor beggars can do no less than pray for their benefactors, and Saul did no more.

4. He prophesies his advancement to the throne; v. 20. He knew it before, by Samuel's promise of it to him; and he had as much reason to say, concerning David, as David concerning him, How can I put forth my hand against the Lord's anointed? But now he knew it by the interest he found David had in the people, the special providence of God in protecting him, and the generous, kingly spirit he had now given proof of in sparing his enemy. Saul's acknowledgment here of David's incontestable title to the crown, was a great encouragement to David, and a support to his faith and hope.

5. He binds David with an oath, hereafter to show the same tenderness of his seed, and name, as he had now showed of his person, v. 21. David had more reason to bind Saul by an oath not to destroy him, yet he insists not on that; (if the laws of justice and honor would not bind him, an oath would not;) but Saul knew David to be a conscientious man. Though David might be tempted, not only in revenge, but in prudence, to extirpate Saul's family, yet he binds himself not to do it, (v. 22.) knowing God could and would establish the kingdom to him and his, without such bloody methods. This oath he afterward religiously observed; he supported Mephibosheth, and executed those as traitors, that slew Ishbosheth. The hanging several of Saul's posterity, for the destruction of the Gibeonites, was God's appointment, not David's act, and therefore not the violation of this oath.

II. Their parting in peace. 1. Saul, for the present, let fall the persecution: went home convinced, but not converted; ashamed of his envy, yet retaining that root of bitterness; vexed that, when at last he had found David, he could not find in his heart to destroy him. God has many ways to tie the hands of persecutors, when He does not turn their hearts. 2. David continued to shift for his own safety; he knew Saul too well to trust him, and therefore got him up into the hold. It is dangerous venturing on the mercy of a reconciled enemy. We read of those who believed in Christ, and yet He did not commit Himself to them, because He knew all men. They that like David are innocent as doves, must thus like him be wise as serpents.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—22. It is not enough that we avoid evil ourselves: we should use our influence to restrain others also, or we shall be chargeable before God for it.—Mild language and respectful behavior, even to wicked and injurious superiors, are ornamental to piety. It is also more prudent to abate envy by seeking to appear inconsiderable, than to excite it by boasting of dignity, or excellence, or of our past services.—The noblest of all victories consists in 'overcoming evil with good.' Flattering and slanderous favorites are the bane of princes: by hearing their words, they advance their enemies, and persecute their friends; because the clamor of their passions silences the whisper of their consciences.—The most atrocious sinners have seasons of remorse, when they perceive and are affected with their situation: Yet, as they are not truly humbled or changed, sin and the world reign in their hearts.—Those, who are experimentally acquainted with the grace of God, will place little dependence on these appearances, especially in those, who have long sinned against the light of their own consciences: for there is great reason to fear, that these transient affections also will subside, and leave the heart still harder than before. ed him; nor could he suppress his emotion, or refuse to acknowledge his convictions: But his conduct illustrates the behavior of the scribes and priests in their determined enmity to Christ, notwithstanding they could not resist the wisdom of his words, deny the reality of his miracles, or at all impeach his character. NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1. If Samuel was 18 years of age at the death of Eli, he must have been at least 38 when he vanquished the Philistines at Ebenezer. (7: 1, 2.) But how many years elapsed, from that time, to his anointing Saul; how long he lived after Saul was made king; how long Saul survived him; or how long Saul reigned in all, are matters of conjecture or calculation, without any certain data to proceed upon. (Acts 13: 21.) Perhaps Saul survived Samuel 3 or 4 years.—Doubtless Samuel, to the end of his days, presided over the seminary of prophets, and, by his prayers, instructions, and example, was very useful in private; though he did not much intermeddle in public business. When he died, the people in general were deeply him, and buried him [c]in his house at Ramah. And David arose, and went down to [d]the wilderness of Paran.

instances other troubles; if one vexation seem to be over, we must not be secure.

V. 1. We have here a short account of Samuel's death and burial. 1. Though a great man, and one admirably qualified for public service, yet he spent the latter end of his days in retirement; not because superannuated, for he knew how to preside in a college of the prophets, (ch. 19: 20.) but because rejected by Israel, (God thus justly chastising them,) and because his desire was to be quiet, and now in his advanced years to enjoy himself and his God in acts of devotion. Let old people be willing to rest, though it look like burying themselves alive.

2. Though a fast friend to David, for which Saul hated him, as also for dealing plainly with him; yet he died in peace, even in the worst days of Saul's tyranny, who, he sometimes feared, would kill him, ch. 16: 2. Saul loved him not, yet feared him, as Herod did John: and feared the people, for all knew him to be a prophet. Thus is Saul restrained from hurting him.

3. All Israel lamented him; and had reason, for they all had a loss in him. His personal merits, and his former public services, made this respect to his name and memory a just debt; it had been very ungrateful to withhold it. The sons of the prophets had lost the founder and president of their college, and all Israel a constant intercessor, ch. 12: 23. The loss is the more grievous just now, when Saul is grown so outrageous, and David driven from his country; never more need of Samuel than now, yet now he is removed. We will hope Israel lamented his death the more bitterly, because they remembered against themselves their own sin and folly in rejecting him, and desiring a king. Those have hard hearts, who can bury their faithful ministers with dry eyes; who are not sensible of the loss of those who have prayed for them, and taught them the way of the Lord. When God's providence removes relations and friends, we ought to be humbled for our misconduct toward them, while with us.

4. They buried him not in the school of the prophets at Naioth, but in his own house, or perhaps in the garden pertaining to it, at Ramah, where he was born.

5. David, hereupon, went down to the wilderness of Paran, retiring, perhaps, to mourn the more solemnly Samuel's death. Or, rather, because now, having lost so good a friend, he apprehended his danger to be greater than ever; now it was he dwelt in the tents of Kedar, Ps. 120: 5. In some parts of this wilderness of Paran, Israel wandered when they came out of Egypt; the place would bring to mind God's care of them, and David might improve that for his own encouragement.

V. 2—11. Here begins the story of Nabal.

I. A short account of him. Observe, 1. His name: Nabal; a fool, so it signifies: and so indeed we all deserve to be called, when we come into the world; for Man is born like the wild ass's colt, and foolishness is bound up in our hearts. 2. His family: he was of the house of Caleb, and inherited his estate; for Maon and Carmel lay near Hebron, which was given to Caleb; (Josh. 15: 54, 55.—14: 14.) but he was far from inheriting his virtues. Indeed, he was a disgrace to his family. The Seventy, and some other ancient versions, read it appellatively: He was a dogged man, of a currish disposition, surly and snappish, and always snarling—a cynic. 3. His wealth: this was very great; riches are common blessings, which God often gives to Nabals, to whom He gives neither wisdom nor grace. 4. His wife: Abigail; a woman of great understanding. Her name signifies, the joy of her father; yet he could not promise himself much joy of her, when he married her to such a husband. Many a child is thrown away upon great wealth; married to that and to nothing else desirable. Wisdom is good with an inheritance, but an inheritance is good for little without wisdom. 5. His character: he had no sense either of honor or honesty, so he could but get and save. This is the character given of Nabal by Him who knows what every man is.

II. David's humble request to him, to send him some victuals for himself and his men.

1. David, it seems, was in distress. What little reason have we to value the wealth of this world, when so great a churl as Nabal was, abounds, and so great a saint, as David was, suffers want! Yet if Providence bring him to these straits, David will not say, that to beg he is ashamed. Yet see Ps. 37: 25.

2. He chose a good time to send. Nabal had many hands employed, for whom he was to make a plentiful entertainment. Had he sent at another time, Nabal would have pretended he had nothing to spare, but now he could not have that excuse. It was usual to make feasts at their sheep-shearings, as appears from Absalom's feast on that occasion; (2 Sam. 13: 24.) wool was one of the staple commodities of Canaan.

3. David ordered his men to deliver their message to him with great respect, v. 5. He puts words in their mouths; v 6. (our translators add, in prosperity;) as if those live indeed, that live as Nabal did, with abundance of wealth about them; whereas, in truth, those that live in pleasure, are dead while they live. This was too high a compliment to pass upon Nabal, to call him the man that liveth. David knew better things, that in God's favor is life, not in the world's smiles: and by the rough answer he was well enough served. Yet his good wishes were very commendable sensible of their loss, and of their sin and folly in rejecting him; which conviction the disastrous events of Saul's reign, and his capricious and tyrannical conduct, would enhance: so that, collecting themselves together, they made general lamentations for him, and honorably buried him. (M. R. d.) SCOTT.

4. He pleaded the kindness Nabal's shepherd.

'Samuel died in the 97th or 98th year of his age: he ruled 16 years, or, as others think, 20 ys. before the reign of Saul, and judged Israel, i. e. was their principal judge, about 40 ys. [See Acts 13: 21.] No wonder so righteous a ruler and just a judge should be universally lamented, especially when the wisdom and equity of his government, compared with Saul's tyranny and extravagances, made his memory more dear, and his loss more regretted. He was buried in his own house at Ramah, for the Jews had no places of public sepulture. Each family had their private sepulchres: which appears to have been the case from Abraham to Joseph of Arimathea.—How singular was the character and piety of Samuel! Devoted to God from his birth, and worthy to be so! Early dedicated to Him, and hallowed by his influence! Descended from prophets, himself a greater. The service of God was made the early business of his life, nor interrupted by any thing but the service of his country. No man in his senses, in the vigor of life, in the age of ambition and avarice, forced by no danger, urged by no guilt, and pressed by no infirmity of mind or body, ever yet, voluntarily, and of his own choice, resigned the supreme power, secluded his sons from the succession, and elected two strangers to it, in succession, neither of whom he had ever seen before. Samuel did all this; and therefore, when the Scriptures assure us he did it by the divine command, we cannot help believing them. The narration carries its own irresistible evidence along with it.—Happy Samuel! [who entirely merged his own will in that of the Almighty, exalted to supreme power without ambition; exerting it without oppression or avarice, and resigning it without reluctance, when his God commanded!] Retiring with undiminished dignity or, to speak more truly, with added honor, from the concurrent and universal testimony of his country to his equity and incorruption! Oh, would princes so use their power, or so resign it! ... It were hard to determine which was happiest, his life or his death. He lived to the noblest purposes, the glory of God and the good of his country; he died full of years and honors, universally lamented and desired. Such was SAMUEL! Such always were, and such always will be, in a good measure, all those, whose beginnings are laid in true religion: whose duty is their delight, and their God their glory.' DODD. 'Oh, how seldom in the annals of the world, from the assembled heads of the great body politic, can a departing prime minister hear, "Thou hast not defrauded us; thou hast not oppressed us; neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand." This voice can be heard from Gilgal: yet of what other minister can this be spoken but of Samuel the seer, who was the gift of God's mercy to the people of Israel; whose memory was too precious to be intrusted to public monuments, but stands, and alas, with the exception of Daniel, in his administration, almost alone in the BOOK OF GOD!' Verses 3—6.

(M. R.) Of the house of Caleb. (3.) The LXX render it, a man like A DOG; for the Heb. word Caleb signifies a dog.—That liveth, &c. (6.) In this friendly, and respectful, and highly benevolent salutation, David seems to have spoken unadvisedly, in calling a sottish and luxurious wicked man, 'him that liveth;' as if his own indigence scarcely deserved the name of life. be both to thee, and peace be to thine house, and peace be unto all that thou hast.

7 And now I have heard that thou hast shearers: now thy shepherds which were with us, [n] we [*] hurt them not, neither was there ought missing unto them, all the while they were in Carmel.

8 Ask thy young men, and they will show thee. Wherefore let the young men find favor in thine eyes: (for we come in [o] a good day:) give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh to thine hand unto thy servants, and to [p] thy son David.

9 And when David's young men came, they spake to Nabal according to all those words in the name of David, and [†] ceased.

10 And Nabal answered David's servants, and said, [q] Who is David? and who is the son of Jesse? [r] There be many servants nowadays that break away every man from his master.

11 [s] Shall I then take my bread, and my water, and my [‡] flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and [t] give it unto men [u] whom I know not whence they be?

12 So David's young men turned their way, and went again, and [x] came and told him all those sayings.

13 And David said unto his men, [y] Gird ye on every man his sword. And they girded on every man his sword, and [z] David also girded on his sword, and there went up after David about four hundred men; [a] and two hundred abode by the stuff.

14 ¶ But one of the young men told Abigail, Nabal's wife, saying, Behold, David sent messengers out of the wilderness to salute our master; and he § railed on them.

15 But the men were [b] very good unto us, and we were not ‖ hurt, neither missed we any thing, as long as we were conversant with them, when we were in the fields:

16 They were [c] a wall unto us both by night and day, all the while we were with them keeping the sheep.

17 Now therefore know and consider what thou wilt do; for [d] evil is determined against our master, and against all his household: for he is such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him.

18 Then Abigail made haste, and took two hundred loaves, and two bottles of wine, and five sheep ready dressed, and five measures of parched corn, and an hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs, and laid them on asses.

19 And she said unto her servants, Go on before me; behold, I come after you. But she told not her husband Nabal.

20 And it was so, as she rode on the ass, that she came down by the covert of the hill, and, behold, David and his men came down against her; and she met them.

21 Now David had said, Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness, so that nothing was missed of all that pertained unto him: and he hath requited me evil for good.

22 So and more also do God unto the enemies of David, if I leave of all that pertain to him by the morning light any that pisseth against a wall.

23 ¶ And when Abigail saw David, she hasted, and lighted off the ass, and fell before David on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, 24 And fell at his feet, and said, Upon me, my lord, upon me let this iniquity be: and let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak in thine audience, and hear the words of thine handmaid.

25 Let not my lord, I pray thee, regard this man of Belial, even Nabal: for as his name is, so is he; Nabal is his name, and folly is with him: but I thine handmaid saw not the young men of my lord, whom thou didst send.

26 Now therefore, my lord, as the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, seeing the LORD hath withholden thee from coming to shed blood, and from avenging thyself with thine hand, now let thine enemies, and they that seek evil to my lord, be as Nabal.

27 And now this blessing which thine handmaid hath brought unto my lord, let even be given unto the young men that follow my lord.

28 Forgive, I pray thee, the trespass of thine handmaid: for the LORD will certainly make my lord a sure house; because my lord fighteth the battles of the LORD, and evil hath not been found in thee all thy days.

29 Yet a man is risen to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul: but the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the LORD thy God; and the souls of thine enemies, them shall he sling out, as out of the middle of a sling.

30 And it shall come to pass, when the LORD shall have done to my lord according to all the good that he hath spoken concerning thee, and shall have appointed thee ruler over Israel, 31 That this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart unto my lord, either that thou hast shed blood causeless, or that my lord hath avenged himself: but when the LORD shall have dealt well with my lord, then remember thine handmaid.

32 ¶ And David said to Abigail, Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me:

33 And blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand.

34 For in deed, as the LORD God of Israel liveth, which hath kept me back from hurting thee, except thou hadst hasted and come to meet me, surely there had not been left unto Nabal by the morning light any that pisseth against a wall.

35 So David received of her hand that which she had brought him, and said unto her, Go up in peace to thine house; see, I have hearkened to thy voice, and have accepted thy person.

36 ¶ And Abigail came to Nabal; and, behold, he held a feast in his house, like the feast of a king; and Nabal's heart was merry within him, for he was very drunken: wherefore she told him nothing, less or more, until the morning light.

37 But it came to pass in the morning, when the wine was gone out of Nabal, and his wife had told him these things, that his heart died within him, and he became as a stone.

38 And it came to pass about ten days after, that the LORD smote Nabal, that he died.

39 ¶ And when David heard that Nabal was dead, he said, Blessed be the LORD, that hath pleaded the cause of my reproach from the hand of Nabal, and hath kept his servant from evil: for the LORD hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head. And David sent and communed with Abigail, to take her to him to wife.

40 And when the servants of David were come to Abigail to Carmel, they spake unto her, saying, David sent us unto thee, to take thee to him to wife.

41 And she arose, and bowed herself on her face to the earth, and said, Behold, let thine handmaid be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my lord.

42 And Abigail hasted, and arose, and rode upon an ass, with five damsels of hers that went after her; and she went after the messengers of David, and became his wife.

43 David also took Ahinoam of Jezreel; and they were also both of them his wives.

44 But Saul had given Michal his daughter, David's wife, to Phalti the son of Laish, which was of Gallim.

know what is in their hearts! From Saul, David expected injuries, and against those he stood on his guard, and so kept his temper; but from Nabal he expected kindness, whose affront therefore took him off his guard, and put him for the present into disorder. What need have we to pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

III. The account given of this matter to Abigail, by one of the servants, more considerate than the rest, v. 14. Abigail, being a woman of good understanding, took cognizance of the matter, even from her servant.

V. 18—31. We have here, Abigail's prudent management to preserve her husband and family from the destruction just coming on them: in which, it was her wisdom, that, what she did she did quickly, v. 18. It was her wisdom, too, that what she did, she did herself: because, being a woman of great and very happy address, she knew better how to manage it than any servant she had. The virtuous woman will herself look well to the ways of her household, and not devolve it wholly on others.

Abigail must endeavor to atone for Nabal's faults. And, I. By a most generous present, she atones for his denial of David's request. She prepares the very best the house afforded, and abundance of it, (v. 18.) according to the usual entertainments of those times. Nabal grudged them water, but she took two bottles of wine, loaded her asses with provisions, and sent them before; for a gift pacifieth anger: Jacob thus pacified Esau. This she did, not only lawfully, but laudably, without her husband's knowledge, even when she had reason to think, that, if he had known he would not have consented to it; because it was not to gratify her own pride, or vanity, but for the necessary defence of him and his family, which otherwise had been inevitably ruined. Husbands and wives, for their common benefit, have a joint-interest in their worldly possessions; but if either waste, or unduly spend, it is robbing the other.

II. By a most obliging demeanor, and charming speech, she atones for Nabal's abusive language. She met David on the march, big with resentment, and meditating the destruction of Nabal; (v. 20.) but with all possible expressions of complaisance and respect she humbly begs his favor, and solicits him to pass by the offence. Her demeanor was very submissive, v. 23, 24. Yielding pacifies great offences. She puts herself into the place and posture of a penitent, and of a petitioner, and was not ashamed to do it. She humbly begs David will give her audience. But this was unnecessary; what she said was sufficient to command it; for certainly nothing could be more fine or more moving. No topic of argument is left untouched, every thing is well placed, and well expressed, most pertinently and pathetically urged, and improved to the best advantage, with such a force of natural rhetoric as cannot easily be paralleled.

1. She speaks to him all along with the deference and respect due to so great and good a man; calls him My lord over and over, to expiate her husband's crime, in saying, 'Who is David?' She does not upbraid him with the heat of his passion, though he deserved to be reproved for it; nor does she tell him how ill it became his character; but endeavors to soften him, and bring him to a better temper; not doubting but that then his own conscience would upbraid him with it.

2. She takes the blame of the ill treatment of his messengers upon herself, v. 24, 28. And, here she discovered the sincerity and strength of her conjugal affection, and concern for her family: whatever Nabal was, he was her husband.

3. She excuses her husband's fault by imputing it to his natural weakness and want of understanding, v. 23. 'It was owing to his folly, not his malice. He is simple, but not spiteful. Forgive him, for he knows not what he does.' What she said was too true; but she said it to excuse his fault and prevent his ruin, else she had not done well to give such a bad character of her own husband, whom she ought to make the best of, and not speak ill of him.

4. She pleads her own ignorance of the matter; intimating, that though her husband was foolish, and unfit to manage his affairs himself, yet he had so much wisdom as to take her advice.

5. She takes it for granted she had gained the point already, perhaps, perceiving by David's countenance, that he began to change his mind, v. 26. She depends not on her own reasonings, but God's grace, to mollify him, and doubts not but that grace would work powerfully on him. Perhaps she intimates it was below him to take vengeance on so weak and impotent an enemy as Nabal, for he need wish no more concerning his enemies, than that they might be as unable to resist him as Nabal was. Perhaps she refers to his sparing Saul, when, but the other day, he had him at his mercy. The very mentioning of what he was about to do, to shed blood, and avenge himself, was enough to work on such a tender, gracious spirit as David's; and it should seem, by his reply, (v. 33.) that it affected him.

6. She offers the present she had brought, but speaks of it as unworthy of David's acceptance; and therefore desires it might be given to the young men that followed him, (v. 27.) and particularly to those ten that were his messengers to Nabal, whom he had treated so rudely.

7. She applauds David for the good services he had done against the common enemies of his

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. The most honored servants of God have the measure and period of their usefulness appointed them: but those who persevere unto the end, walking with God, and living consistently with their profession, are happy, though rejected by men, and driven into retired and obscure situations. Indeed whole nations have cause to lament, when faithful instructers, holy men of God, and public intercessors, are taken away. But Jesus, our Prophet, Priest, Intercessor, and Judge, ever lives to take care of those who trust in Him.—To be descended from honorable ancestors forms one branch of man's foolish vanity (3); yet it frequently is a most severe reproach to the character and conduct of those who value themselves upon it.—It is incumbent on parents, in respect of their children, and on young persons in their own case, to resist all temptations to a conduct, which is likely to be so fatal in its consequences [as marriage for wealth.] But prudent and pious relations are an invaluable treasure, and often retard the ruin of those, who have not sense to know their worth:—and especially, 'a prudent wife is from the Lord.' (Prov. 19: 14.) Those, whom the Lord most honors, are frequently very destitute for a season; and, as they will not have recourse to fraud or violence, like others in similar circumstances; so they should be careful, lest they verge towards flattery, and pass such compliments as do not consist with truth, and as tend to confirm sinners in a favorable opinion of themselves.—Wordly men deem riches their own; but God declares they are another's, and that they must shortly give an account of their stewardship. (Luke 16: 12.)—In imitation of the Lord's example, we are commanded to do good to the evil and ungrateful; and wretched should we all be, if He dealt with us by those rules, which we are often disposed to adopt in our behavior to our poor brethren.—While we enjoy abundance, we should be liberal to the indigent. (Luke 14: 12—14.)—Silence is generally our wisdom, when assaulted by provoking language; otherwise we shall be betrayed into folly and sin: and when the messengers of the Son of David meet with abuse and railing for his sake, they must hold their peace, and report it to their Lord, who will surely and justly resent it.

Any that, &c.] (22.) A proverbial expression then in common use, which may, with the utmost propriety, be read, 'every male.'

22 [n] So and more also do God unto the enemies of David, [o] if I leave of all that pertain to him, by the morning-light, [p] any that pisseth against the wall.

23 And when Abigail saw David, she hasted, and [q] lighted off the ass, and [r] fell before David on her face, and bowed herself to the ground.

24 And [s] fell at his feet, and said, [t] Upon me, my lord, upon me let this iniquity be: and [u] let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak in thine * audience, and hear the words of thine handmaid.

25 Let not my lord, I pray thee, † regard this [x] man of Belial, even Nabal: for as his name is, so is he; ‡ Nabal is his name, and folly is with him: but I thine handmaid saw not the young men of my lord, whom thou didst send.

26 Now therefore, my lord, [y] as the LORD liveth, [z] and as thy soul liveth, seeing [a] the LORD hath withholden thee from coming to shed blood, and [b] from § avenging thyself with thine own hand, now [c] let thine enemies, and they that seek evil to my lord, be as Nabal.

27 And now this ‖ blessing, which thine handmaid hath brought unto my lord, let it even be given unto the young men that ¶ follow my lord.

28 I pray thee [d] forgive the trespass of thine handmaid: for [e] the LORD will certainly make my lord a sure house; because my lord [f] fighteth the battles of the LORD, and [g] evil hath not been found in thee all thy days.

29 Yet a man is risen to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul: but the soul of my lord shall be [h] bound in the bundle of life [i] with the LORD thy God, and the souls of thine enemies, them shall he [j] sling out,  as out of the middle of a sling.

30 And it shall come to pass, when the LORD shall have done to my lord [k] according to all the good that he hath spoken concerning thee, and shall have appointed thee ruler over Israel;

32 And David said to Abigail, [n] Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me:

33 And [o] blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, [p] which hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from [q] avenging myself with mine own hand.

34 For in very deed, as the LORD God of Israel liveth, which hath kept me back from hurting thee, except thou hadst [r] hasted and come to meet me, surely [s] there had not been left unto Nabal, by the morning light, any that pisseth against the wall.

35 So David received of her hand that which

8. She foretells the glorious issue of his present troubles. She speaks with assurance, (1.) That God would [w] keep him safe; God shall keep thy soul in life, (as the expression is, Ps. 66: 9,) as we hold those things tight which are bundled up, or which are precious to us, (Ps. 119: 15.) Thy soul shall be treasured up in the treasure of lives, so the Chaldee, under lock and key, as our treasure is. The Jews understand this, not only of the life that now is, but of that which is to come, even the happiness of separate souls, and therefore use it commonly as an inscription on their grave-stones. 'Here we have laid the body, but trusting that the soul is bound up in the bundle of life with the Lord our God.' (2.) That God would make him victorious over his enemies. Their souls He shall sling out, v. 29. The stone is in the sling only to be thrown out again: so the souls of the godly shall be bundled as corn for the barn, but the souls of the wicked as tares for the fire. (3.) That God would settle him in wealth and power; 'God will make thee great, and it is the glory of great men to pass by offences.'

9. She desires him to consider how much more comfortable it would be to him on reflection, to forgive this affront than to revenge it, v. 30, 31. She reserves this argument for the last, a very powerful one, with so good a man: That the less he indulged his passion, the more he consulted his peace, and the repose of his own conscience, which every wise man will be tender of. Many have done that in a heat, which they have a thousand times wished undone. The sweetness of revenge is soon turned into bitterness. When we are tempted to sin, we should consider how it will appear on reflection. Let us never do any thing for which our conscience will afterward upbraid us, and which we shall look back upon with regret. My heart shall not reproach me.

Lastly, She recommends herself to his favor; 'When the Lord shall have dealt well with my lord, then remember thine handmaid, as one that kept thee from doing what would have disgraced thy honor, disquieted thy conscience, and made a blot in thy history.' We have reason to remember those with respect and gratitude, who have been instrumental to keep us from sin.

V. 32—35. As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprover upon an obedient ear. Abigail was a wise reprover of David's passion, and he gave an obedient ear to the reproof, according to his own principle, (Ps. 141: 5.) Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness. Never was such an admonition either better given, or better taken.

1. David thanks God for sending him this happy check in a sinful way, v. 32. Note, God is to be acknowledged in all kindnesses our friends do us either for soul or body. Whoever meets us with counsel, direction, comfort, caution, or seasonable reproof, we must see God sending them.

2. He thanks Abigail. Most are ready to think it enough, if they take a reproof patiently; few take it thankfully, and commend those that give it, v. 33. Abigail did not rejoice more that she had been instrumental to save her husband and family from death, than David that she had been instrumental to save him and his men from sin.

3. He seems very apprehensive of the great danger he was in, which magnified the mercy of his deliverance. The more heinous any sin is, the greater mercy it is to be kept from it. He seems to aggravate the evil of his design with this, that it would have been an injury to so wise and good a woman; God has kept me back from hurting thee, v. 34. Or, perhaps, at the first sight of Abigail, he was conscious of a thought to do her a mischief for offering to oppose him; and therefore reckons it a great mercy God gave him patience to hear her speak. He speaks of his danger as very imminent; Except thou hadst hasted. The nearer we were to the commission of sin, the

Verses 23—31.

The conduct and address of Abigail, on this emergency, are worthy of high admiration. Nothing seems to have been omitted which suited the occasion; nothing unsuitable added; all was expressed in the most persuasive manner; and the whole manifests Abigail to have been a woman of strong faith and great piety, as well as of singular prudence and ingenuity. SCOTT.

'This speech of Abigail's is full of such humble, pathetic, natural, and therefore artless eloquence, as is not, I verily think, to be paralleled in all antiquity.' DODD.

Verse 34.

Though David only intended the death of the men: yet if Abigail and the other women had escaped the massacre, they must have been most deeply injured; therefore 'the LORD had kept him back from hurting her,' as well as Nabal and his men servants, or other assistants. SCOTT.

Verse 35. M. R.—Note, Gen. 33: 10. ED.

she had brought him, and said unto her, [t] Go up in peace to thine house; see, I have hearkened to thy voice, and have [u] accepted thy person.

36 ¶ And Abigail came to Nabal; and, behold, he held [x] a feast in his house like the feast of a king; and Nabal's heart was [y] merry within him, for he was very drunken: wherefore [z] she told him nothing, less or more, until the morning-light.

37 But it came to pass in the morning, when the wine was gone out of Nabal, and his wife [a] had told him these things, that [b] his heart died within him, and he became as a stone.

38 And it came to pass about ten days after, that [c] the LORD smote Nabal, that he died.

39 And when David heard that Nabal was dead, he said, [d] Blessed be the LORD, that hath [e] pleaded the cause of my reproach from the hand of Nabal, and hath [f] kept his servant from evil: for the LORD [g] hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head. And David sent and communed with Abigail, [h] to take her to him to wife.

40 And when the servants of David were come to Abigail to Carmel, they spake unto her, saying, [i] David sent us unto thee, to take thee to him to wife.

41 And she arose, and bowed herself on greater was the mercy of a seasonable restraint: Almost gone, (Ps. 73: 2.) and yet upheld.

4. He dismissed her with an answer of peace, v. 35. He, in effect, owns himself overcome by her eloquence. Note, (1.) Wise and good men will hear reason, and let that rule them, though it come from persons every way their inferiors, and though their passions are up, and their spirits provoked. (2.) Oaths cannot bind us to what is sinful. David had solemnly vowed the death of Nabal; he did ill to make such a vow, but he had done worse had he performed it. (3.) A wise and faithful reproof is often better taken, and speeds better than we expected; such is the hold God has of men's consciences. See Prov. 28: 23.

V. 36—44. We are now to attend Nabal's funeral, and Abigail's wedding.

I. Nabal's funeral. The apostle speaks of some twice dead, Jude 12. We have here Nabal thrice dead, though just now wonderfully delivered; for the preservations of wicked men, are but reservations for some further sorer strokes of divine wrath. Here is,

1. Nabal dead drunk, v. 36. Abigail came home; (it should seem, he had neither missed her, nor the provisions she took;) but she found him in the midst of his jollity, little thinking how near he was to ruin, by one whom he had foolishly made his enemy. Sinners often feel most secure, when most in danger. He held a feast like the feast of a king, so magnificent and abundant, though his guests were but his sheep-shearers. It is very common for the most niggardly to be most profuse in gratifying a vain humor, or a base lust. A mite is grudged to God and his poor; but, to make a fair show in the flesh, gold is lavished out of the bag. Nabal, that never thought he could bestow too little in charity, never thought he could bestow too much in luxury. Abigail finding him in this condition, (and, probably, those about him little better, in view of his example,) had enough to do to set the house to rights, but told Nabal nothing of what she had done with reference to David, nothing of his folly in provoking David's anger, or of his deliverance; for, being drunk, he was as incapable to hear reason, as to speak it. To give good advice to those that are in drink, is to cast pearls before swine; better stay till they are sober.

2. Nabal dead with melancholy, v. 37. Some suggest, the expense of the satisfaction made to David, by Abigail's present, broke his heart: it seems rather, the apprehension he now had of the danger he had narrowly escaped, put him into a consternation, and seized his spirits, so that he could not recover it. He grew sullen, and said little, ashamed of his own folly, and put out of countenance by his wife's wisdom. How is he changed! His heart over-night merry with wine, next morning heavy as a stone; so deceitful are carnal pleasures; so transient the laughter of the fool; the end of that mirth is heaviness. Joy in God makes the heart always light.

3. Nabal, at last, dead indeed. About ten days after, when he had been kept so long under this pressure and pain, the Lord smote him that he died; (v. 38.) and, it should seem, he never held up his head. It is just with God, (says Bp. Hall,) that they who live without grace, should die without comfort; nor can we expect better, while we go on in our sins. Here is no lamentation for Nabal. David, when he heard of his death, gave God thanks for it, v. 39. He blessed God, (1.) That He had kept him from killing him. He rejoices that Nabal died a natural death, and not by his hand. We should take all occasions to mention and magnify God's goodness to us, in keeping us from sin. (2.) That He had thereby encouraged him, and all others, to commit their cause to God, when any way injured, with an assurance that, in his own time, He will right them, if they sit still, and leave it to Him.

II. Abigail's wedding. David was so charmed with the beauty of her person, and the uncommon prudence of her conduct and address, that, as soon as was proper, after he heard she was a widow, he informed her of his attachment to her, (v. 39.) not doubting, but that she who approved herself so good a wife to so bad a husband, would much more make him a good wife. She received his address with great modesty and humility, (v. 41.) agreed to his proposal, went with his messengers, took a retinue with her agreeable to her quality, and became his wife, v. 42. She did not her face to the earth, and said, Behold, let [k] thine handmaid be a servant [l] to wash the feet of the servants of my lord.

42 And [m] Abigail hasted, and arose, and rode upon an ass, with five damsels of hers that went * after her; and she went after the messengers of David, and became his wife.

43 David also took Ahinoam of [n] Jezreel; and they were also [o] both of them [p] his wives.

44 But Saul had given [q] Michal his daughter, David's wife, to [r] Phalti the son of Laish, which was of [s] Gallim.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 18—44. In urgent cases, despatch is as requisite as prudence: inferior interests should always be sacrificed to preserve the greater; our property to preserve our lives; our very lives for the salvation of our souls.—Every servant of God should duly estimate his own situation; what his obligations, professions, and prospects are; what his station in the church; what his former conduct and present character; that he may with great circumspection avoid every inconsistent word and action: for according to these things, will be men's expectations from him and censures of him. (Ec. 10: 1. Matt. 5: 14—16.)—Happy is the true believer! [t] his soul is bound up in the bundle of life with the LORD his God,' and because the Savior liveth, he shall live also; whilst all his foes shall be driven to destruction.—Our gratitude to God should precede, but not exclude, our gratitude to the instruments of his goodness.—Real penitents will not be backward to take shame to themselves, and to retract their rash expressions.—The people of God need not avenge their own cause, for He will surely do it for them: and sometimes more awfully than they could have desired: yet when his purpose is known, they will adore his justice, and bless Him for his kindness to them.—If the danger of a violent death be so terrifying, as to overwhelm the spirits in dismay and anguish, how should sinners tremble at the thoughts of eternal damnation, and flee without delay from the wrath to come!

It is probable David had married Ahinoam, as soon as Michal was married to Phalti, and that he afterwards married Abigail also. (2 Sam. 3: 13—16.) In this he was carried away with the custom of the times, and was connived at in having more than one wife.

CHAP. XXVI.

Saul, informed by the Ziphites, pursues David to Hachilah, 1—4. David by night comes to Saul's tent, with Abishai, whom he hinders from slaying Saul; but he takes away his spear and cruse, 5—12. David at a distance reproves Abner's negligence, protests his own innocency, and expostulates with Saul, 13—20. Saul owns his sin, and returns home, 21—25.

AND the [a] Ziphites came unto Saul to Gibeah, saying, [b] Doth not David hide himself in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon?

2 Then [c] Saul arose, and went down to the wilderness of Ziph, having [d] three thousand chosen men of Israel with him, to seek David in the wilderness of Ziph.

3 And Saul pitched in the hill of [e] Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon, by the way. But David abode in the wilderness, and he saw that Saul came after him into the wilderness.

4 David therefore [f] sent out spies, and understood that Saul was come in very deed.

5 And David arose, and came to the place where Saul had pitched: and David beheld the place where Saul lay, and [g] Abner the son of Ner, the captain of his host: and Saul lay in the * trench, and the people pitched round about him.

6 Then answered David and said to Ahimelech the [h] Hittite, and to [i] Abishai the son of [k] Zeruiah, brother to Joab, saying, [l] Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp? And Abishai said, I will go down with thee.

7 So David and Abishai came to the people by night: and, behold, Saul lay sleeping [m] within the trench, and his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster: but Abner and the people lay round about him.

8 Then said Abishai to David, [n] God hath † delivered thine enemy into thine hand this day: now therefore let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear, even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him [o] the second time.

9 And David said to Abishai, Destroy him not: for [p] who can stretch forth his hand against the LORD'S anointed, and be guiltless?

10 David said furthermore, As [q] the LORD liveth, the LORD shall smite him; or [r] his day shall come to die; or [s] he shall de-

CHAP. XXVI. David's troubles from Saul here begin again; after Saul had owned his fault in persecuting David, and David's title to the crown, he revives the persecution; so perfectly lost was he to all sense of honor and virtue. The story is much like that in ch. 24. In both, David is delivered out of Saul's hand, and Saul out of David's.

V. 1—5. Here, 1. Saul gets information of David's motions, and acts offensively. David was now betrayed in the same place where he was formerly, ch. 23: 19. Perhaps Saul had intimated to the Ziphites, that he continued his design against David, and would be glad of their assistance: or, for aught we know, Saul would have continued in the same good mind he was in, (ch. 24: 17.) and would not have troubled David afresh, had not the Ziphites put him on. See what need we have to pray to God against temptation. Saul readily caught at the information, and went down with an army of 3000 men, to the place where David hid himself, v. 2. How soon do unsanctified hearts lose the good impressions their convictions have made on them.

2. David gets information of Saul's motions, and acts defensively; though he sought only his own safety, not Saul's ruin, and therefore abode in the wilderness, (v. 3.) thereby curbing the bravery of his own spirit by a silent retirement, showing more true valor than he could have done by an irregular resistance. (1.) He had spies who ascertained him of Saul's descent; (v. 4.) for he would not believe Saul would deal so basely till he had the utmost evidence of it. (2.) He observed with his own eyes how Saul was encamped, v. 5. He came toward Saul and his men, so near as to be able, undiscovered, to view their intrenchments, probably, in the dusk of the evening.

V. 6—12. Here is, I. David's bold adventure into Saul's camp in the night, accompanied only by his kinsman Abishai, the son of Zeruiah. Another of his confidants, (v. 6.) declined it as too dangerous, or, at least, was content that Abishai, who was forward to it, should risk it rather than himself. Whether David was prompted to this by his own courage, or by an extraordinary impression on his spirits, or by the oracle, does not appear, but, like Gideon, he ventured through the guards, with a special assurance of divine protection.

II. The posture he found the camp in. Saul lay sleeping in the trench, or, as some read it, in his chariot, and in the midst of his carriages, with his spear stuck in the ground by him, to be ready if his quarters should be beaten up, (v. 7.) and all the soldiers, even those that were appointed to stand sentinel, were fast asleep, v. 12. Thus were their eyes closed, and their hands bound, for a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them; something extraordinary there was in it, that they should all be asleep together, and so fast asleep, that David and Abishai walked and talked among them, and yet none of them stirred. Sleep, when God gives it his beloved, is their rest and refreshment; but He can, when He pleases, make it to his enemies their imprisonment. Ps. 76: 5, 6. Rom. 11: 8. The Lord has the command of the powers of nature, and makes them serve his purposes as He pleases. Whom God will disable or destroy, He binds up with a spirit of slumber.

III. Abishai would not urge David to it himself, because he had declined before, when he had a like opportunity; but he begged earnestly he might do it, pleading that Saul was, not only cruel and implacable, but false and perfidious, whom no reason would rule, nor kindness work upon, and that God had now delivered him into his hand, and did, in effect, bid him strike. It was but accidental that Saul happened to enter the cave with him at the same time; but here was something extraordinary: the deep sleep on Saul and all his guards, was manifestly from the Lord, so now a special providence gave him this opportunity; he ought not therefore to let it slip.

IV. David's generous refusal, and resolute loyalty, v. 9. 1. It would be a sinful affront to God's ordinance. Saul was the Lord's anointed king of Israel, by the special appointment and nomination of the God of Israel; the power that was; and to resist him was to resist the ordinance of God, Rom. 13: 2. 2. It would be a sinful anticipation of God's providence; God had sufficiently showed

NOTES:

CHAP. XXVI. V. 5—7. It is probable, David was directed to this measure by the prophetical Spirit, in order that all Israel might be convinced how injuriously he was slandered by his enemies. Ahimelech was a proselyted Hittite, and Abishai, David's sister's son. (M. R. i. 14: 6—10.) SCOTT.

(5.) 'As David and his men knew the country, they had many advantages of Saul and his men; and no doubt could often watch them without being discovered.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—Trench.] So the Chal. The Heb. is from a root signifying roundness. The Vulg. transl. tent. Sept. lampene. Others, orbit, wheel-tracks. 'One can hardly imagine it signifies a ditch and bank thrown up, as might be supposed from the use here of the word trench; for no precautions appear to have been taken against David. Nor does it mean "a ring of carriages, [as Schindler, Cocceius, &c.] for they, probably, could not pass in that mountainous country. But it seems to mean the round or circle which the troops formed, in the midst of which, as the place of honor, Saul slept. With this agrees perfectly the view D'Arvieux gives of a modern Arab camp; for he tells us it is always round, the prince being in the middle,' &c. HEWLETT. ED.

Verses 8—12.

It has been suggested, David spared Saul, the LORD'S anointed, out of policy, that he might not teach the people a bad lesson against himself; but it is evident, he acted from higher motives. The Lord forbade scend into battle, and perish.

11 The LORD forbid [t] that I should stretch forth mine hand against the LORD's anointed: but, I pray thee, take thou now the spear that is at his bolster, and the cruse of water, and let us go.

12 So David took [u] the spear and the cruse of water from Saul's bolster; and they gat them away, and no man saw it, nor knew it, neither awaked: for they were all asleep; because [v] a deep sleep from the LORD was fallen upon them.

13 ¶ Then David went over to the other side, and stood on [x] the top of an hill afar off; a great space being between them:

14 And David cried to the people, and to Abner the son of Ner, saying, Answerest thou not, Abner? Then Abner answered and said, Who art thou that criest to the king?

15 And David said to Abner, Art not thou a valiant man? and who is like to thee in Israel? wherefore then hast thou not kept thy lord the king? for [y] there came one of the people in to destroy the king thy lord.

16 This thing is not good that thou hast done. As the LORD liveth ye are [*] worthy to die, because ye have not kept your master, the [z] LORD's anointed. And now see where the king's spear is, and the cruse of water that was at his bolster.

17 And Saul knew David's voice, and said, [a] Is this thy voice, my son David? And David said, It is my voice, my lord, O king.

18 And he said, [b] Wherefore doth my lord thus pursue after his servant? for [c] what have I done? or what evil is in mine hand?

19 Now therefore, I pray thee, [d] let my lord the king hear the words of his servant: If the LORD have [e] stirred thee up against me, let him † accept an offering: but if they be the children of men, [f] cursed be they before the LORD; for [g] they have driven me out this day from ‡ abiding in [h] the inheritance of the LORD, saying, Go, serve other gods.

20 Now therefore, [i] let not my blood fall to the earth before the him, in Nabal's case, that, if he left it to Him to do him right, He would do it in due time. Therefore he resolves to wait till God shall avenge him, and will by no means avenge himself, v. 10. The temptation indeed was very strong; but if he yield, he sins against God, therefore he resists it with the utmost resolution, v. 11. Thus bravely does he prefer his conscience to his interest, and trust God with the issue.

V. The improvement he made of this opportunity, for the further evidence of his own integrity, v. 12. Had a physician given them the strongest opiate or stupefying dose, they could not have been faster asleep. Saul's spear for his defence, and his cup of water for his refreshment, were both stolen from him while he slept. Thus do we lose our strength and our comfort, when we are careless and secure, and off our watch.

V. 13—20. David being got safe from Saul's camp himself, and having brought with him proofs sufficient that he had been there, posts himself conveniently, so that they might hear him, and yet not reach him, (v. 13.) and then begins to reason with them on what had passed.

I. He reasons ironically with Abner, and keenly banters him. David knew well it was from the mighty power of God, that Abner and the rest of the guards were so deep asleep. But he reproaches Abner, as unworthy to be captain of the life-guards, who could sleep, when the king his master lay so much exposed. By this it appears the hand of God locked them up in this deep sleep, that, as soon as David was out of danger, a very little thing awakened them, even David's voice at a great distance, v. 14. David, to put Abner in confusion, tells him, 1. That he had lost his honor; (v. 15.) 'Art not thou a man?' so the word is; 'a man in office, bound, by the duty of thy place, to inspect the soldiery? A sluggard call himself a general!' 2. That he had deserved to lose his head; (v. 16.) 'Ye are all worthy to die, by martial law, for being off your guard, when you had the king himself asleep in the midst of you. Behold this token. See where the king's spear is, in the hand of him whom the king himself is pleased to count his enemy. They that took away this, might as easily and safely have taken away his life. Now see who are the king's best friends; you that neglected him and left him exposed, or I that protected him, when he was exposed. You pursue me as worthy to die, and irritate Saul against me; but who is worthy to die now?' Note, Sometimes those that unjustly condemn others, are justly left to fall into condemnation themselves.

II. He reasons seriously and affectionately with Saul; who was now so well awakened as to hear what was said, and discern who said it, v. 17. In the same manner he had expressed his relentings, ch. 24: 16. He had given his wife to another, and yet calls him son; thirsted after his blood, and yet is glad to hear his voice. Those are bad indeed that have never any convictions of good, nor any good impressions. David now enters into a close argument with him, concerning the trouble he still continued to give him, endeavoring to persuade him to let fall the persecution, and be reconciled.

1. He complains of the very melancholy condition he was brought into by the enmity of Saul against him. (1.) He was driven from his master, and from his business, v. 18. 'How gladly would I serve thee as formerly, if my service might be accepted; but, instead of being owned as a servant, I am pursued as a rebel; my lord is my enemy, and compels me to flee from him, whom I would follow with respect.' (2.) He was driven from his God and from his religion; and this was a much greater grievance than the former, v. 19. And what troubled him, was, not so much that he was driven out from his own inheritance, as that he was driven out from the inheritance of the Lord, the holy land. His enemies did, in effect, send him to go serve other gods; and perhaps he had heard that some of them had spoken to that purport of him. They that forbid our attendance on God's ordinances, do what in them lies to estrange us from God, and to make us heathens. If David had not been a man of extraordinary grace, and firmness to his religion, the ill usage he met with from his own prince and people, would have prejudiced him against the religion they professed, and have driven him to communicate with idolaters. We are to reckon that the greatest injury that can be done us, which exposes us to sin. Of those who thus led David into temptation, he here says, Cursed be they before the Lord. Those fall under a curse, that thrust out those whom God receives.

2. He insists on his own innocency, v. 18. He had the testimony of his conscience, that he had never done, nor ever designed, any mischief to the person, honor, or government, of his prince, nor to any of the interests of his country: he had lately had Saul's own testimony concerning him, ch. 24: 17. It was very unreasonable and wicked for Saul to pursue him as a criminal, when he could not charge him with any crime.

3. He endeavors to convince Saul his pursuit of him was not only wrong, but mean, and much

Verse 20.

Hunt a partridge.] 'It is worthy of remark that partridges, being put up several times, soon become so weary as not to be able to fly, face of the LORD: for [k] the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains.

21 Then said Saul, [l] I have sinned: return, my son David: for [m] I will no more do thee harm, because [n] my soul was precious in thine eyes this day: behold, I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly.

22 And David answered and said, Behold the king's spear; and let one of the young men come over and fetch it.

23 The LORD [o] render to every man his righteousness and his faithfulness: for the LORD delivered thee into my hand to-day, but [p] I would not stretch forth mine hand against the LORD's anointed.

24 And, behold, [q] as thy life was much set by this day in mine eyes, so let my life be much set by in the eyes of the LORD, and [r] let him deliver me out of all tribulation.

25 Then Saul said to David, [s] Blessed be thou, my son David: thou shalt both do great things, and also shalt still [t] prevail. [u] So David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place.

below him, v. 20. He compares himself to a partridge, a very innocent harmless bird, which, when attempts are made on its life, flies if it can, but makes no resistance. And would Saul bring the flower of his army into the field, only to hunt one poor partridge? What a disparagement this to his honor! What a stain would it be on his memory! To trample on so weak and patient, as well as so innocent, an enemy. James 5: 6.

4. He desires the core of the controversy might be searched into, and some proper method taken to bring it to an end, v. 19. He was not willing to say (though it was very true) that Saul's own envy and malice put him on to persecute him; therefore he concludes it must be attributed either to the righteous judgment of God, or to the unrighteous designs of evil men. Now, (1.) 'If the Lord have stirred thee up against me, in displeasure either to me, or to thee, if it be the effect of that evil spirit from the Lord which troubles thee, let Him accept an offering from us both; let us join in making our peace with God, and reconciling ourselves to Him, which may be done, by sacrifice; and then I hope the sin will be pardoned, whatever it is, and the trouble will end.' See the right method of peace-making: let us first make God our Friend, by Christ the great Sacrifice, and then all other enmities shall be slain, Eph. 2: 16. Prov. 16: 7. But, (2.) [x] If thou art put upon it by wicked men, that incense thee against me, cursed be they before the Lord;' that is, they are wicked people, and it is fit they should be abandoned as such, and excluded from the king's court and councils. He decently lays the blame on the evil counsellors who advised the king to what was dishonorable and dishonest, and insists on it, that they be removed, and forbidden his presence, as men cursed before the Lord, and then he hoped he should gain his petition, v. 20. Thus pathetically does David plead with Saul for his life, and, in order to that, for his favorable opinion of him.

V. 21—25. Here is, I. Saul's penitent confession of his fault and folly in persecuting David, and his promise to do so no more. This second instance of David's respect wrought more on him than the former, and extorted from him better acknowledgments, v. 21. 1. He owns himself melted and overcome by David's kindness; '[y] My soul was precious in thine eyes this day, which, I thought, had been odious.' 2. He acknowledges he had done very ill to persecute him: acted against God's law, I have sinned; and against his own interest, 'I have played the fool; herein (says he) I have erred exceedingly, and wronged both thee and myself.' 3. He invites him to court again; Return, my son David. Those that understand themselves, will see it their interest to have those about them, that behave themselves wisely, as David did, and have God with them. 4. He promises him he would not persecute him as he had done, but protect him; I will no more do thee harm. We have reason to think, according to the mind he was now in, he meant as he said, and yet neither his confession nor his promise of amendment came from a principle of true repentance.

II. David's improvement of Saul's convictions and confessions, and the evidence he had to produce of his own sincerity. He desired one of the footmen might fetch the spear, (v. 22.) and then, v. 23. 1. He appeals to God, as Judge of the controversy; The Lord render to every man his righteousness. David, by faith, is sure He will do it, for He infallibly knows the true characters of all persons and actions, and is inflexibly just to render to every man according to his work; and, by prayer, he desires He would do it, wherein he does, in effect, pray against Saul, who had dealt unrighteously and unfaithfully with him; (Ps. 28: 4.) but he principally intends it for himself, that God would protect him in his righteousness and faithfulness, and reward him for it, since Saul so ill requited him. 2. He reminds Saul again of the proof he had now given of his respect to him, from a principle of loyalty; intimating the anointing oil was his protection, for which he was indebted to the Lord, and ought to express his gratitude to Him: had he been a common person, he would not have been so tender of him; and, perhaps, with this further suggestion, Saul knew, or had reason to think, David was the Lord's anointed too, and therefore, by the same rule, Saul ought to be as tender of David's life, as he had been of his. 3. Not relying much on Saul's promises, he puts himself under God's protection, and begs his favor; v. 24. which they may with a holy confidence do, that do well and suffer for it.

III. Saul's prediction of David's advancement. He commends him, v. 25. So strong was now his conviction of David's honesty, that he was not ashamed to condemn himself, and applaud David, even in the hearing of his own soldiers, who could not but blush to think they were come out so furiously against a man, whom their master, when he meets, caresses thus. He foretells his victories, and his elevation at last; Thou shalt do great things. Note, Those who make conscience of doing what is truly good, may come, by the divine assistance, to do what is truly great. He adds, 'Thou shalt also still prevail, more and more;' he means, against himself, but was loath to speak that out. The princely qualities which appeared in David, his generosity in sparing Saul,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

One crime generally proves an inducement to another, and seems to render it necessary for self-preservation: and this again makes way for further, and still more atrocious vices.—After deep convictions and temporary reformations, men return to their sins, and become worse than ever.—The servants of God ought to persevere in a blameless conduct, however injured.—Confidence in God fortifies the soul against temptations to seek relief by sin: and it often requires as much resolution to restrain the excesses of misjudging, zealous friends, as to stand firm against the rage of incensed enemies.—If we would have outward blessings with comfort and reputation, we must patiently and quietly wait for them in the path of duty: and when wicked men obstruct the purposes of God, and the performance of his promises, He can easily remove them without our help.—We are exposed to so many dangers, whenever we close our eyes, that we should previously examine our state, whether we be ready for death; and then commit ourselves to the keeping of that Almighty Protector, who 'neither slumbereth nor sleepeth.' (1 Thes. 5: 1—3.)—The supposed friends of ungodly men are either incapable of serving them, or they treacherously neglect and expose them: and the pious people, whom they hate and revile, are their most valuable friends, as they persevere in prayers for them and kindness to them.—Evident integrity and consistency of conduct go further in producing conviction, than all the powers of eloquence without them: and for want of this confirmation, much sound reasoning and pathetic exhortation pass for unmeaning declamation.—Those who drive us from our duty, or tempt us to sin, are our worst enemies: and persecutors, besides murdering men's bodies, must give a dreadful account, as chargeable with murdering the souls of all whom they have driven to apostasy, or to do violence to their own consciences, by the terrors of exile, imprisonment, or death.—In sinning against God, men 'play the fool exceedingly.'—No good words, or fair professions, entitle those to our confidence, who have long sinned against the light: yet the confessions of obstinate sinners may be useful, in satisfying us that we are in the right way, and shall prevail; and in encouraging us to persevere, expecting our recompense from God alone.

CHAP. XXVII.

David escapes to Gath, and is received by Achish, 1—3. Saul seeks him no more, 4. He asks Ziklag of Achish, 5—7. He invades the adjacent countries; and disingenuously leads Achish to suppose that he warred against Judah, 8—12.

AND David [a] said in his heart, I shall now [*] perish one day by the hand of Saul: [b] there is nothing better for me, than that I should speedily escape [c] into the land of the Philistines; and Saul shall despair of me, to seek me any more in any coast of Israel: so shall I escape out of his hand.

2 And David arose, and he passed over, with [d] the six hundred men that were with him, unto [e] Achish, the son of Maoch, king of Gath.

3 And David dwelt with Achish at Gath, he and his men, every man with his household, even David [f] with his two wives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail the Carmelitess, Nabal's wife.

4 And it was told Saul that David was fled to Gath: and [g] he sought no more again for him.

5 And David said unto Achish, If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in [h] some town in the country, that I may dwell there: for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee?

6 Then Achish gave him [i] Ziklag that day: wherefore Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah unto this day.

CHAP. XXVII. David was a man after God's own heart, yet he had his faults, which are recorded, not for our imitation, but for our admonition; witness the story of this chapter.

V. 1—7. Here is, I. The prevalency of David's fear, the effect of the weakness of his faith, v. 1. He represented to himself the restless rage and malice of Saul, who could not be reconciled; the treachery of his own countrymen, the Ziphites, once and again; his own forces, how few they were, and no recruits had come in of a great while, nor could he perceive that he got any ground: unbelief is a sin that easily besets even good men. When without are fightings, within are fears, and it is hard to get over them. Lord, increase our faith!

II. The resolution he came to hereupon. Consulting his own heart only, and not the ephod or the prophet, he concludes, There is nothing better for me, than to escape speedily into the land of the Philistines. But, as Saul was his own enemy in driving David to this extremity, so David was no friend to himself in taking this course. See what need we have to pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

III. The kind reception he had at Gath; Achish bade him welcome, partly out of generosity, and partly out of policy. No doubt he gave David a solemn promise of protection. We may blush that the word of a Philistine should go further than the word of an Israelite, and the city of Gath be a place of refuge for a good man, when the cities of Israel refuse him a safe abode. David, 1. Brought his men with him, (v. 2.) as a guard, and that they might be safe; also to recommend himself the more to Achish, who hoped for service out of him.

IV. Saul's desisting from the further persecution of him, v. 4. Because he dares not come where he is, he resolves to let him alone. Thus many seem to leave their sins, but really their sins leave them; they would persist in them, if they could.

V. David's removes from Gath to Ziklag. He knew what it was to be envied in the court of Saul, and had much more reason to fear in the court of Achish, therefore he declines preferment there, and wishes for a settlement in the country. In a town of his own, he might have the more free exercise of his religion, keep his men better to it, and not be vexed, as at Gath, with the idolatries of the Philistines. He does not prescribe to Achish the place he would have, but only begs it might be in some town in the country; but he gives this reason, 'Why should thy servant dwell in the royal city, to crowd thee, and disoblige those about thee?' Note, Those that would stand fast, must not covet to stand high; and humble souls aim not to dwell in royal cities.

The grant Achish made him, was very generous and kind, v. 6, 7. Hereby, (1.) Israel recovered their ancient right; for Ziklag was in the lot of Judah, Josh. 15: 31. and afterward was assigned, with some other cities, to Simeon, Josh. 19: 5. (2.) David gained a commodious settlement, not only at a distance from Gath, but bordering on Israel, where he might correspond with his own countrymen, and whither they might resort to him, at the revolution now approaching. We do not find that while Saul lived, he had more than his 600 men, (ch. 30: 10.) yet, immediately after Saul's death, that was the rendezvous of his friends. Nay, it should seem, while he kept himself close, because of Saul, multitudes resorted to him, at least, to assure him of their sincere intentions, 1 Chron. 12: 1—22. And this further advantage David gained, that Ziklag was annexed to the crown, at least the royalty of it pertained to the kings of Judah, ever after, v. 6. Note, There is nothing lost by humility and modesty, and a willingness to retire. Real advantages follow those that flee from imaginary honors. Here David continued 4 months, as it may very well be read, (v. 7.) or some days above 4 months. The Seventy read it, some months; so long he waited for the set time of his accession to the throne; for he that believeth, shall not make haste.

V. 8—12. Here is an account of David's actions, while in the land of the Philistines; a fierce attack he made on some remains of the devoted nations, his success in it, and the representation he gave of it to Achish.

1. In this, we may acquit him of cruelty and injustice, because the people he cut off, were such as Heaven had long since doomed to destruction. The Amalekites were to be all cut off; probably the Geshurites and Gezrites were branches of Amalek: Saul was rejected for sparing them; David makes up the deficiency of his obedience

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1, 2. David, while reflecting on the inveterate malice of Saul, and the neglect, cowardice, and treachery of his countrymen, lost sight of his having been anointed to be king of Israel, with the annexed promises of God, and the manifold deliverances which he had experienced. He went to Gath, perhaps invited by Achish, but evidently without inquiring of the Lord. (21: 10—15.) This measure was calculated to alienate the affections of the Israelites, and to give credit to the slanders of his accusers; he thus ran himself and his men into temptations to idolatry; and he laid himself under obligations to those, whom he could never favor, without betraying the cause of God. (26: 19. 28: 1, 2. 29: 2, 8—11. Ps. 141: 1—5.) SCOTT.

and the asses, and the camels, and the apparel, and returned and came to Achish.

10 And Achish said * Whither have ye made a road to-day? [p] And David said, Against the south of Judah, and against the south of [q] the Jerahmeelites, and against the south of the [r] Kenites.

11 And David saved neither man nor woman alive, to bring tidings to Gath, saying, [s] Lest they should tell on us, saying, So did David, and so will be his manner, all the while he dwelleth in the country of the Philistines.

12 And Achish believed David, saying, He hath made his people Israel [t] utterly to abhor him; therefore he shall be my servant for ever.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Achish, preparing war against Israel, places confidence in David, 1,2. Saul, after having destroyed those who had familiar spirits, at length, fearing the Philistines and being forsaken by God, goes to the witch of En-dor and engages to indemnify her, 3—10. She, by his desire, calls up Samuel, who predicts his ruin, 11—19. Saul falls down in despair; but, being prevailed on to take food, he returns to his army, 20—25.

B. C. 1056. AND it came to pass in those days, [a] that the [b] Philistines gathered their armies together for warfare, to fight with Israel. And Achish said unto David, Know thou assuredly, that [c] thou shalt go out with me to battle, thou and thy men.

2 And David said to Achish, [d] Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do. And Achish said to David, Therefore will I make thee keeper of mine head for ever.

3 ¶ Now * Samuel was dead, and all Israel had lamented him, and buried him in Ramah, even in his own city. And Saul had [f] put away those that had before he succeeds him. He smote them, and left none alive, v. 8, 9. The service paid itself, for they carried off abundance of spoil, which served for the subsistence of David's forces.

2. Yet we cannot acquit him of dissimulation with Achish, in the account of this expedition.

(1.) David, it seems, was not willing he should know the truth; (v. 11.) not because he was ashamed of what he had done as a bad thing, but because he was afraid, if the Philistines knew it, they would be apprehensive of danger to themselves or their allies, by harboring him among them, and would expel him their coasts: therefore he industriously conceals it from them, which, it seems, he could do, by putting them all to the sword; for none of their neighbors would inform against him, nor, perhaps, would soon come to the knowledge of what was done; intelligence not being so readily communicated then as now.

(2.) He hid it from Achish, with an equivocation not at all becoming his character. v. 10. It was true, he had invaded the countries south of Judah, but he made Achish believe he had invaded those that lay south in Judah, the Ziphites, for example; so Achish understood him, and thence inferred he had made his people Israel abhor him, and so riveted himself in the interest of Achish. Achish's fidelity to him, and good opinion of him, aggravate his sin in deceiving him thus; which, with some other such instances, David seems penitently to reflect upon, when he prays, Remove from me the way of lying.

CHAP. XXVIII. Preparations are herein making for that war, which will put an end to the life and reign of Saul, and so make way for David to the throne.

V. 1—6. Here is, I. The Philistines' design against Israel. v. 1. If the Israelites had not forsaken God, there had been no Philistines remaining to molest them; if Saul had not forsaken Him, they had by this time been put out of all danger by them. The Philistines took an opportunity to make this attempt, when they had David among them, whom they feared more than Saul and all his forces.

II. Achish's expectation of assistance from David in this war, and the encouragement David gave him to expect it; 'Thou shalt go with me to battle,' says Achish. David gave him an ambiguous answer. v. 2. Thus he keeps himself free from a promise to serve him, and yet keeps up his expectation of it. For Achish took it in no other sense, than as an engagement to assist him, and promised him, thereupon, that he would make him captain of the guards, protector, or prime minister of state.

III. The drawing of the armies, on both sides, into the field, v. 4. The Philistines pitched in Shunem, in Issachar, a great way north from their country. Israel was ill guarded, when the Philistines could march their army into the very heart of the country. Saul, while he pursued David, left his people naked and exposed. On some of the adjacent mountains of Gilboa, Saul musters his forces.

IV. Saul in terror and at loss on the occasion, v. 5. Had he kept close to God, he needed not have been afraid of an army of Philistines; but now that he had provoked God to forsake him, his interest failed, his armies dwindled, and looked mean, and, which was worse, his spirits failed, his heart sunk within him. A guilty conscience made him tremble; now he remembered the guilty Amalekites he had spared, and the innocent priests, he had slaughtered; his sins are set in

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The strongest believers cannot wholly exclude the incursions of unbelief, during tedious trials, and when sense and reason bring in no report of deliverance. Many, under sharp temptations, have overlooked former mercies and experiences; forgotten the power and promise of the Lord; and feared that sin and Satan would finally prevail against them. When faith thus staggers, obedience wavers, and sinful expedients frequently are employed; which involve men more and more in difficulties and temptations.—If at any time we 'lean to our own understanding,' and do not ask counsel of God, we are sure to do wrong. (Prov. 3: 5, 6.)—We ought not to quit the path of duty, or to join interests with the enemies of religion, even for self-preservation, or out of care for our families: nor should we willingly contract obligations, where we cannot consistently make requitals of kindness.—It is our wisdom to shun notoriety, and to shelter ourselves from envy; for obscurity is commonly more safe and comfortable, and no less advantageous. Yet we must in no situation be wholly inactive, but attempt something in the cause of God and his people, even though ungratefully requited by those whom we would serve.—The fear of man is so ensnaring, that we should, if possible, keep out of those places, where doing our duty will expose us to danger or reproach.—An equivocation, which serves the purpose of a lie, bears the same relation to it, that a hypocrite does to a profane person; it is only apparently better, and therefore a more dangerous cheat. But though believers often betray their imperfections, they can never be prevailed upon deliberately to renounce the service of God, and to unite interests with his enemies, or to become the servants of sin and Satan. SCOTT.

Verse 10.

Whither have ye made a road to-day?] 'This seems to imply that he had probably been in the habit of making predatory excursions.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—'From this verse, and similar passages, we may observe the strict impartiality of the sacred Scriptures. They present us with the most faithful delineations of human nature, in an early age of the world; they exhibit the frailties and infirmities of kings, of priests and of prophets, with equal truth; and examples of vice and frailty, as well as of piety and virtue, are held up "for instruction in righteousness," that we might guard against those errors, to which the best men are exposed, and which we cannot avoid without the greatest vigilance and care.' HEWLETT.

Verse 11.

Lest they, &c.] This seems adverse to the opinion of Henry, Scott, &c. who commend David for destroying these devoted nations, as if he did it from regard to God, whereas he 'saved neither man nor woman alive, lest they should tell it at Gath,' &c. 'Shame on him,' says Dr. A. Clarke, 'who becomes the apologist of such conduct.' ED.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1, 2. Achish, when determined to make war against Israel, required David's assistance: and David could not have refused it without the greatest danger. Yet if he had directly promised it, and had then either stood neuter, or gone over to the Israelites, he must have behaved with great ingratitude and treachery: and if he had fought against Israel, he would have been guilty of a very great sin, he would have alienated the affections of his people, and perhaps exposed himself to the reproach of having murdered Saul. It seemed therefore impossible that he should extricate himself, with a good conscience, and a clear reputation. He, however, returned an insincere and evasive answer, which was intended to gain time, but which Achish understood as a promise of effectual assistance; (Notes, 27: 8—12. 29: 8—11.) and on that account promised to make him captain of his guard, or some great officer about his person. order before his eyes, they put him into confusion, embarrass all his counsels, and rob him of his courage; so that there remained only a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation. Note, troubles are terrors to the wicked. In this distress, Saul inquired of the Lord. v. 6. Need drives those to God, who, in their prosperity, slighted his oracles and altars, Isa. 26: 16. Did ever any seek the Lord, and not find Him? Yes, Saul. Should He be inquired of at all, by such a one? Ezek. 14: 3. No, for, 1. He inquired in such a manner, as if he had not inquired at all. Therefore it is said, (1 Chron. 10: 14.) He inquired not of the Lord, for he did it faintly, and coldly, and with a secret design, if God did not answer him, to consult the devil. He did not inquire in faith, but with a double, unstable mind. 2. He inquired too late, when the days of his probation were over, and he finally rejected. Seek the Lord while He may be found, for there is a time when He will not be found. 3. He had forfeited the benefit of all the methods of inquiry. Could he that had hated and persecuted Samuel and David, who were both prophets, expect to be answered by prophets? Or he that had slain the high priest, to be answered by Urim? Or he that had sinned away the Spirit of grace, to be answered by dreams? No, Be not deceived, God is not mocked.

He had put the laws in execution against those that had familiar spirits, who must not be suffered to live. Ex. 22: 18. Some think he did this in the beginning of his reign, while under Samuel's influence; others that it was lately done, for it is spoken of here, v. 9. as a late edict. Perhaps, when Saul was himself troubled with an evil spirit, he suspected he was bewitched, and, for that reason, cut off all that had familiar spirits. Many seem zealous against sin, when they themselves are any way hurt by it, who have no concern for the glory of God, nor any dislike of sin as sin. However, it was commendable thus to use his power. Note, Many seem enemies to sin in others, while they indulge it in themselves. Saul will drive the devil out of his kingdom, and yet harbor him in his heart, by envy and malice.

V. 7—14. Here, I. Saul seeks for a witch, v. 7. Herein he is chargeable with contempt of the God of Israel; as if any creature could do him a kindness, when God had left him, and frowned upon him. Now he has recourse to that as an oracle, which he had before condemned as an abomination. It is common for men to inveigh severely against those sins which they are in no temptation to, but suffer themselves afterward to be overcome by them. Who knows what mischiefs they will run into, that forsake God, and are forsaken of Him?

II. He goes to her by night, and in disguise, with only two servants, and probably on foot, v. 8. See how those that are led captive by Satan, are forced, 1. To disparage themselves. Never did Saul look so mean, as when he went sneaking to a sorry witch to know his fortune. 2. To dissemble. Evil works are works of darkness, and hate the light. Saul went in disguise, not only lest the witch herself, if she had known him, should have declined to serve him, either fearing he came to trepan her, or resolving to be avenged on him for his edict against those of her profession; but lest his own people should know it, and abhor him for it. Such is the power of natural conscience, that even those who do evil, blush, and are ashamed to do it.

III. He tells her his errand, and promises her impunity. 1. He hoped to serve his purpose by necromancy, or divination by the dead; v. 8. this was expressly forbidden by the law. Deut. 18: 11. This supposes, that it was generally taken for granted, that souls exist after death, and that great knowledge was attributed to separate souls. But to think that any good souls should come up at the beck of an evil spirit, or that God, who had denied a man the benefit of his own institutions, should suffer him to reap any real advantage by a cursed, diabolical invention, was very absurd. 2. She signifies her fear of the law, and her suspicion that this stranger came to draw her into a snare: v. 9. Providence ordered it so, that Saul should be told to his face of his edict against witches, at this very time when he was consulting one, for the greater aggravation of his sin. She insists on the peril of the law, perhaps to raise her price: for no doubt she demanded, and had a large one. Observe how sensible she is of danger from Saul, and careful against it; but not at all apprehensive of the obligations of God's law, and the terrors of his wrath. She fears a snare laid for her life, more than a snare laid for her soul. It is common for sinners to be more afraid of punishment from men, than of God's righteous judgment. But, 3. Saul promises with an oath not to betray her, v. 10. It was his duty, as a king, to punish her, and he knew it, yet he swears not to do it; as if he could by his own oath bind himself from doing that, which, by the divine command, he was bound to do. But he promised more than he could perform, when he said, There shall no punishment happen to thee; for he could not secure himself, much less her from divine vengeance.

IV. Samuel, who was lately dead, is the person Saul desired to talk with, and the witch, with her enchantments, gratifies his desire, and brings them together. Samuel had anointed him, and had formerly been his faithful friend and counsellor, therefore with him he wished to advise. While Samuel was living at Ramah, not far from Gibeah of Saul, presiding there in the school of the prophets, we never read of Saul's advising with him in any of his difficulties; but now he is dead, 'O for Samuel again! By all means, bring me up Samuel.' Note, Many despise and persecute God's saints and ministers when living, who would be glad to have them again, when dead. Send Lazarus to me, and send Lazarus to my father's house. The sepulchres of the righteous are garnished.

1. Here is a seeming defect or chasm in the story. One would have expected to be told how she performed the operation, but the Scripture conceals sinful art, that we may be simple concerning evil. We should not covet to know the depths of Satan.

2. The witch, upon sight of the apparition, was aware her client was Saul: her familiar spirit, it is likely, informing her of it, v. 12. Had she

Saul inquired of the LORD,' under urgent terror, but without humiliation for sin, or purposes of repentance; and therefore God would not vouchsafe him any answer. He did not inquire till his doom was sealed; and then only in a hypocritical manner: therefore it was nearly the same as 'not inquiring.' (Note, 1 Chr. 10: 13, 14.) After Abiathar had fled to David, probably Saul appointed another high priest: yet neither by him, nor by any prophet, nor in any way, could he obtain an answer. (15. 14: 37.) This showed, that God was greatly displeased with him, and warned him to repent, and to cry for mercy with humble faith and perseverance. (Note, Judg. 10: 13—16.) It also proved, that God no longer regarded him as chief magistrate in Israel. (Notes, 23: 9—13. Ex. 28: 30. Num. 27: 21.)

En-dor.] 'A city in the valley of Jezreel, at the foot of mount Gilboa, where the army of Saul had now encamped.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Respecting the case here, interpreters seem to have three principal theories, neither of which, however, is entirely relieved of difficulty. The first and most generally sustained, especially by the older commentators, is that which considers the case as presenting no other than Satan personating Samuel; the second, which is sustained by Scott, and others of similar character, Dr. A. Clarke, &c. considers it as presenting Samuel actually called up by the miraculous power of God, who commissions him to denounce Saul, &c. and the third, which Hewlett, referring to 'the Companion of the Holy Bible,' and to Michaelis, inclines to, considers it as a case of the most ordinary deception by imposition, not requiring so much even as ventriloquism. Some regard it as a gross trick of Saul's courtiers and the hag, to deter Saul from hazarding a battle,—the courtiers being frightened at the array of the Philistines, and the witch well paid. ED.

Verses 9, 10.

believed it was really Samuel whom she saw, she would have had more reason to fear him, who was a good prophet, than Saul, who was a wicked king. But the wrath of earthly princes is feared by most, more than the wrath of the King of kings.

3. Saul (who, we may suppose, was in the next room) bade her not be afraid of him, but go on with the operation, and inquired what she saw? v. 13. They called angels gods, because spiritual beings. But she speaks the language of the heathen, who had their infernal deities, and had them in veneration. Samuel's soul, if it became visible, was expected to appear in the usual resemblance of the body; and God permitted the devil, to answer the design, to put on Samuel's shape, that they who would not receive the love of the truth, might be given up to strong delusion, and believe a lie. That it could not be the soul of Samuel himself, they might easily apprehend, when it ascended out of the earth; for the spirit of a man, much more of a good man, goes upward. But if people will be deceived, it is just with God to say, 'Let them be deceived.' That the devil, by divine permission, should be able to personate Samuel, is not strange, since he can transform himself into an angel of light: nor is it strange he should be permitted to do it on this occasion; that Saul might be driven to despair, by inquiring of the devil, since he would not, in a right manner, inquire of the Lord, by which he might have had comfort. Saul, it seems, was not permitted to see any manner of similitude himself, but he must take the woman's word for it, that she saw an old man covered with a mantle, or robe, the habit of a judge, which Samuel had sometimes worn; and, some think, it was for the sake of that, and the majesty of its aspect, that she called this apparition Elohim, a god, or gods; for so magistrates are styled, Ps. 82: 1.

4. Saul perceiving, by the woman's description, that it was Samuel, stooped with his face to the ground, either, as it is generally taken, in reverence to Samuel, though he saw him not, or perhaps to listen to that soft and muttering voice which he now expected to hear; for they that had familiar spirits, peeped and muttered; (Isa. 8: 19.) and, it should seem, Saul bowed himself, (probably by the witch's direction,) that he might hear what was whispered, and listen carefully to it; for the voice of one that has a familiar spirit, is said to come out of the ground, and to whisper out of the dust, Isa. 29: 4. He would stoop to that, who would not stoop to the word of God.

V. 15—19. We have here the conference between Saul and Satan. Saul came in disguise, (v. 6.) and Satan soon discovered him, v. 12. Satan comes in disguise, and Saul discovers him not. Such is our disadvantage in wrestling with the rulers of the darkness of this world; they know us, while we are ignorant of their wiles and devices.

I. The spectre, or apparition, personating Samuel, asks why he is sent for, v. 15. To us this discovers that it was an evil spirit that personated Samuel; for (as Patrick observes) it is not in the power of witches to disturb the rest of good men, and to bring them back into the world when they please: nor would the true Samuel have acknowledged such a power in magical arts: but to Saul this was a proper device of Satan's to draw veneration from him, to possess him with an opinion of the power of divination, and so to rivet him in the devil's interests.

II. Saul makes his complaint to this counterfeit Samuel, mistaking him for the true; and a most doleful complaint it is, v. 15. He complained not of God's withdrawings till he fell into trouble, till the Philistines made war against him, and then he begins to lament God's departure. He that in his prosperity inquired not after God, in his adversity thought it hard that God answered him not. He does not, like a penitent, own the righteousness of God in this; but, like a man enraged, flies out against God as unkind, and flies off from Him; therefore I have called thee: as if Samuel, a servant of God, would favor those whom God frowned upon; or as if a dead prophet could do him more service than the living ones. One would think, from this, that he really desired to meet with the devil, and expected no other, (though under the covert of Samuel's name,) for he desires advice otherwise than from God, therefore from the devil, that is, a rival with God. 'God denies me, therefore I come to thee.' If I fail with Heaven, I will succeed with hell.

III. Cold comfort this evil spirit gave, and manifestly intended to drive Saul to despair and self-murder. Had it been the true Samuel, he

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. When we in the least deviate from the plain path of duty, every circumstance tends to draw us further aside, and to increase our perplexity and temptation.—When death has removed the ministers and servants of God, or persecution has banished them, a land is deprived of its best defence, and its enemies have their best opportunity of preparing war against it.—When habits of perjury, or profane swearing, have been contracted, the sacred name of God, and the most solemn oaths, are often introduced in the midst of the most horrible wickedness, and made the obligations and encouragements to the most enormous crimes! But the atrocious guilt of such impiety cannot be expressed.—Consulting witches, or diviners of any kind, real or pretended, is a malignant or ignorant attempt to gain intelligence or assistance from some creature, when it cannot be had, or is not sought, from the Lord in the path of duty; and is therefore essentially idolatry, and virtually the worship of the devil. law! Verse 11.

It is probable, that she expected to impose on Saul by some satanical apparition. ID.

Verses 12—19.

It is much disputed, who it was that appeared on this occasion; for the whole narrative manifests that it was no human imposture. Many expositors, ancient and modern, have maintained, that it was Satan personating Samuel; though the text does not give the least intimation of it. It is, however, by no means advisable, to give those men any countenance, who, to support a favorite system, put a forced construction upon the words of holy writ, very different from their obvious meaning: and scarcely any of their interpretations can sound harsher, than the insertion in every place, where Samuel is mentioned, 'that it was Satan personating Samuel.'—It is indeed argued, that the woman's incantations could have 'no power over a glorified saint:' but to this it may fairly be answered, that neither could an evil spirit appear at her call, without the Lord's permission. Though the woman was not the cause of Samuel's being sent, Saul's inquiry might be the occasion of it. The word disquieted, seems to be used merely in accommodation to the general notions of mankind: and the woman's surprise and terror proved, that it was an unusual and unexpected appearance, and not the ordinary effect of her art.—It is, however, further urged, that the apparition's discourse tended to drive Saul to despair, which is one of Satan's temptations; and that it contained no exhortations to repentance, which were usual with the prophets. But to this it may be replied, that Elijah's message to Ahaziah, Daniel's address to Belshazzar, and even Christ's discourse in the presence of Judas, were equally calculated to drive each of them to despair; and equally void of exhortations to repent, and proposals of mercy. (2 Kings 1: 15, 16. Dan. 5: 18—28. Matt. 26: 21—24.)—Saul had despised Samuel's solemn warnings in his lifetime; yet now he hoped, as it were, in defiance of God, to obtain some counsel and encouragement from him: and why might not God permit the soul of his departed prophet to appear, and confirm his former sentence, and denounce Saul's irrevocable doom? It was not beyond the power of God, nor, that I can see, at all unworthy of Him; but rather a declaration of his immutable and irreversible truth and justice.—Satan could not have predicted the several events, which came to pass accordingly, as far as we know, (Note, 30: 1—3.) without being inspired by God to do so: and it would give far more countenance to consulting witches, to suppose that He inspired Satan to prophesy by them, than to conclude that Samuel was sent with this tremendous message from God, when Saul consulted one of them. Indeed this would most powerfully discourage such attempts; as the request of the rich man in hell to Abraham, being entirely vain, is calculated to discourage praying to departed saints. (Luke 16: 24—26.) The local situation of departed spirits is so concealed from us, that the circumstance of the spirit apparently 'arising out of the earth,' forms no real objection against its being the soul of Samuel: and the expression, 'shalt thou and thy sons be with me,' means no more, than that they should be in the eternal world. The transaction was suited to impress the idea of a future state on the mind of all who should ever hear or read of it; and it determined nothing about the

to Saul, [b] Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up? And Saul answered, [c] I am sore distressed: for [d] the Philistines make war against me, and [e] God is departed from me, and [f] answereth me no more, neither by [*] prophets, nor by dreams: [g] therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do.

16 Then said Samuel, [h] Wherefore then dost thou ask of me, seeing the LORD is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy?

17 And the LORD hath done † to him [i] as he spake by ‡ me: for the LORD hath rent the kingdom out of thine hand, and given it to [k] thy neighbor, even to David:

19 Moreover, [m] the LORD will also deliver Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines; and [n] to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me: the LORD also shall deliver the host of Israel into the hand of the Philistines.

20 Then Saul § fell straightway all along on the earth, and was [o] sore afraid, because of the words of Samuel: and there was no strength in him; for he had eaten no bread all the day, nor all the night.

21 And the woman came unto Saul, and saw that he was sore troubled, and said unto him, Behold, thine handmaid hath obeyed thy voice, and [p] I have put my life in my hand, and have hearkened unto thy words which thou spakest unto me.

22 Now therefore, I pray thee, hearken thou also unto the voice of thine handmaid, and let me set a morsel of bread before thee; and eat, that thou mayest have strength, when thou goest on thy way.

23 But he refused, and said, [q] I will not eat: but his servants, together with the woman, [r] compelled him; and he hearkened unto their voice. So he arose from the earth, and sat upon the bed.

would have bid him repent, make his peace with God, and recall David from his banishment; and then have told him, he might hope to find mercy with God: but, he represents his case as helpless and hopeless, serving him as he did Judas, to whom he was first a tempter, and then a tormentor, persuading him first to sell his Master, and then to hang himself. He upbraids him with, 1. His present distress; (v. 16.) he tells him, not only that God was departed from him, but that He was become his enemy, and therefore he must expect no comfortable answer from him. 2. The anointing of David, v. 17. He could not have touched upon a more unpleasant string. Nothing is said to reconcile him to David, but all rather to exasperate him against David. Yet, to make him believe he was Samuel, he says, it was what God spake by him. The devil knows how to speak with an air of religion, and can teach false apostles to transform themselves into the apostles of Christ, and imitate their language. Those who use spells and charms, and plead, in defence of them, that they find nothing in them but what is good, may remember what good words the devil here spoke, and yet with what a malicious design. 3. Disobedience, in not destroying the Amalekites, v. 18. Satan had helped him palliate and excuse that sin, when Samuel was dealing with him to bring him to repentance; but now aggravates it, to make him despair of God's mercy. See what they get, that hearken to Satan's temptations! And see whom they resemble, that allure others to evil, and then reproach them for it! 4. He foretells his approaching ruin, v. 19. (1.) That his army should be routed by the Philistines. This is twice mentioned. This he might foresee, by considering the superior strength and number of the Philistines, the weakness of the armies of Israel, Saul's terror, and especially God's departure from them. Yet, to personate a prophet, he very gravely ascribes it once and again to God; The Lord shall do it. (2.) That he and his sons should be slain in the battle. To-morrow, i. e. in a little time, (and supposing it was now after midnight, I see not but it may be taken strictly for the very next day after that now begun,) thou and thy sons shall be with me; i. e. separate from the body. Had this been the true Samuel, he could not have foretold it, unless God had revealed it to him; and though an evil spirit, God might by him foretell it; as we read of an evil spirit that foresaw Ahab's fall at Ramoth-Gilead, and was instrumental in it, (1 K. 22: 20, &c.) as perhaps this evil spirit was, by divine permission, in Saul's destruction. That evil spirit flattered Ahab, this frightened Saul, and both, that they might fall; so miserable are they that are under the power of Satan; for whether he rage or laugh, there is no rest, Prov. 29: 9.

V. 20—25. We are here told how Saul received this terrible message. He desired to be told what he should do, (v. 15.) but was only told what he had not done, and what should be done to him. Those that expect any good counsel or comfort otherwise than from God, and in the way of his institutions, will be as wretchedly disappointed as Saul. Observe,

I. How he sunk under the load, v. 20. He was indeed unfit to bear it, having eaten nothing all the day before, nor that night. His fear of the Philistines (v. 5.) took away his appetite; or perhaps his struggle with his conscience, in entertaining the thought of consulting the witch, made him nauseate even his necessary food, though ever so dainty. This made him an easy prey to this fresh terror. Now he had enough of consulting witches, and found them miserable comforters. When God in his Word speaks terror to sinners, He opens to them, at the same time, a door of hope, if they repent: but they that apply themselves to the gates of hell for succor, must there expect darkness without a glimpse of light.

II. How he was persuaded to take so much relief, as was necessary to carry him back to the camp. The witch, it should seem, had left Saul alone with the spectre, but, she came to him, (v.

different conditions of the righteous and the wicked.—Upon the whole, there appears much solemnity in God's for once permitting the soul of a departed prophet to appear, as a witness from heaven, and in sending him to confirm the word he spoke on earth, (evincing that the words of the prophets would surely take effect,) and to sit in judgment on a proud enemy of God, who foolishly sought encouragement in his impenitency, by the most atrocious crimes.—This interpretation is certainly obvious, and suited to the apprehensions of the unlearned reader, and according to the general simplicity of the Scriptures: and nothing short of unanswerable arguments and objections, should constrain us to suppose, that when the Holy Spirit said Samuel, He meant Satan, not speaking by Samuel, as he did by the serpent and by the demoniacs; but actually counterfeiting his shape, and speaking with his voice, though Samuel himself was in every sense absent from the place.—The venerable appearance of Samuel, or something he spoke, convinced the woman, that it was Saul who consulted her (12).—'She perceived, by the reverence the spectre paid him, who he was: for so Abarbinel interprets it: he bowed with his face to the ground, in honor of Saul, whereby the woman concluded it was the king.' Patrick. Thus then if the devil personated Samuel, he worshipped Saul, not Saul him! A likely thing, truly, that either Samuel, or Satan personating him, should thus reverence Saul! It shows to what difficulties the supporters of the latter opinion are reduced. Saul's bowing down before Samuel, was not indeed an act of religious worship, any more than Abigail's bowing down before David. The answer of Samuel was in every respect suitable to his character, and to the occasion. It was entirely in vain for Saul to consult the servant, when the Lord was become his enemy: the Lord was only doing to him, or for himself, (17. marg.) as He declared He would: and as Samuel knew him to be finally given up, he neither gave him counsel nor comfort. (2 Tim. 4: 14, 15. Heb. 6: 4—6. 1 John 5: 16—18.)—The woman first saw the appearance; but afterwards Saul seems to have seen it, as well as to have heard the words spoken.—Some think, that neither Saul's servants, nor the woman, heard what passed. CHAP. XXIX.

David attends Achish, which offends the lords of the Philistines, 1—5. Achish dismisses him with commendations, 6—11.

NOW [a] the Philistines gathered together all their armies to [b] Aphek: and the Israelites pitched by a fountain which is in [c] Jezreel.

2 And [d] the lords of the Philistines passed on by hundreds, and by thousands: but [e] David and his men passed on in the rear-ward with Achish.

3 Then said the princes of the Philistines, What do these Hebrews here? And Achish said unto the princes of the Philistines, Is not this David, the servant of Saul the king of Israel, which hath been with me [f] these days, or these years, and I have [g] found no fault in him since he fell unto me unto this day?

4 And the princes of the Philistines were wroth with him; and the princes of the Philistines said unto him, [h] Make this fellow return, that he may go again to his place which thou hast appointed him, and let him not go down with us to battle, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us: for wherewith should he reconcile himself unto his master? should it not be with the heads of these men?

21.) and importuned him to take some refreshment, that he might be able to get clear from her house, fearing that if he should be ill, especially if he should die there, she should be punished for it as a traitor, though she had escaped punishment as a witch. This, it is probable, rather than any sentiment of kindness, made her solicitous to help him. But what a deplorable condition had he brought himself to, when he needed so wretched a comforter!

However, he got back to the camp. And here Josephus much admires the bravery and magnanimity of Saul, that though assured he should lose both his life and honor, yet he would not desert his army, but resolutely returned to the camp, and stood ready for an engagement. I wonder more at the hardness of his heart, that he did not again apply himself to God by repentance and prayer, in hope to obtain, at least, a reprieve; but he desperately ran headlong upon his own ruin. Perhaps, indeed, now that rage and envy possessed him to the uttermost, he was the better reconciled to his hard fate, being told that his sons, and Jonathan among the rest, whom he hated for his affection to David, should die with him. If he must fall, he cared not what desolations of his family and kingdom accompanied his fall, hoping it would be the worse for his successor. He begged not, as David, 'Let thy hand be against me, but not against thy people.'

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1—5. Here is, I. David's great strait. The two armies of the Philistines and the Israelites were encamped, ready to engage, v. 1. Achish, who had been kind to David, had obliged him to come himself, and bring his forces to his service. David came accordingly, and, upon a review of the army, was found with Achish, in the post assigned him in the rear; (v. 2.) whence, should he retire when the armies engaged, he would fall under the indelible reproach, not only of cowardice and treachery, but of base ingratitude to Achish, an unprincipled thing, he could by no means persuade himself to do; or, should he, as was expected, fight for the Philistines against Israel, he would incur the imputation of being an enemy and a traitor to his country, make his own people hate him, and unanimously oppose his coming to the crown. If Saul should be killed (as it proved he was) in this engagement, it would be laid to David, as if he had done it; so that on each side there seemed to be both sin and scandal. This was his strait; and it is a greater strait to a good man, to see sin before him than to see trouble. But he was brought into it by his own unadvisedness, in quitting the land of Judah, and going among the uncircumcised. It is strange, if those that associate with wicked people, come off without guilt, or grief, or both. What he himself proposed to do, does not appear. Perhaps he designed to act only as a keeper to the king's head, the post assigned him, (ch. 28: 2.) and not to do any thing offensively against Israel. But it would have been hard to come so near the brink of sin, and not fall in. Therefore, though God might justly have left him in this difficulty, to chastise him for his folly, yet, because his heart was upright with Him, He would not suffer him to be tempted above what he was able, but with the temptation made a way for him to escape.

II. A door opened for his deliverance. God inclined the hearts of the princes of the Philistines to oppose his being employed in the battle, and to insist on his being dismissed. Thus their enmity befriended him, when no friend he had was capable of doing him such a kindness. 'What do these Hebrews here? (v. 3.) was a proper question. 1. A Hebrew is out of his place, and, if he have the spirit of a Hebrew, is out of his element, when in the camp of the Philistines, and he deserves to be made uneasy there. David used to hate the congregation of evil doers, (Ps. 26: 5.) however he came now to be among them. 2. Achish, on this occasion, bore honorable testimony to David; by which it appears David had conducted very discreetly while he had been with the Philistines: We have need to walk in wisdom toward them that are without, to keep our mouth when the wicked is before us, and to be on the reserve. 3. Yet the princes are peremptory in it, that he must be sent home; and they give good reason for their insisting on it. (1.) Because he had been an old enemy to the Philistines; witness what was sung in honor of his triumphs over them, Saul slew his thousands, and David his ten thousands, v. 5. Who would be fond of popular praise and applause, when even that may, another time, be turned against a man to his reproach? (2.) Because he might be a most dangerous enemy to them, and do them more mischief than all Saul's army could, v. 4. It is dangerous to put confidence in a reconciled enemy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—25. Wretched indeed are they, from whom God is for ever departed! What can they expect either from good or evil men, from holy or unholy spirits? Neither the servants nor the enemies of the Lord can do them any service, and every thing combines to drive them to desperation. In every age God sets up a few such beacons for a tremendous warning to their fellow sinners, not to listen to temptations, to sin against conviction, or despise the Word of God; and to beware of hypocrisy, apostasy, procrastination, and other great wickedness: for none are thus given up of God, who have not provoked Him to it by their previous crimes. (2 Thes. 2: 8—12.) But while one relenting thought remains, let no sinner ever suppose himself in this awful case. God will not indeed hear the prayer of the unhumbled and impenitent; and many inquire of Him in vain, because they are not decidedly in earnest: when therefore they do not meet with encouragement, they exhibit their own hypocrisy, by giving up their religious duties, plunging again into sin, and seeking help from this world, and 'the god of this world.' Let the discouraged, but sincere and earnest inquirer persevere in knocking at mercy's gate, until it be opened. Let us all learn 'to seek the LORD while He may be found, and to call upon Him while He is near,' (Note, Is. 55: 6, 7.) and without reserve to obey his voice and do his will.—Finally, though subjects suffer with their wicked governors, and children with their parents; either it is for their own sins, or else their sufferings 'will work for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1, 2. (M. R.) It may be reasonably supposed, that David was undetermined how to act on this occasion, and waited with a secret hope that the Lord would help him out of this very great difficulty; as indeed He did in a wonderful manner. (28: 1, 2.) He was far too much influenced by fear of man, in so readily consenting to attend Achish, when he might have framed very plausible excuses for declining that service. (Prov. 29: 25, 26.) SCOTT.

(1.) Aphek.] 'A place in the valley of Jezreel, between mount Tabor and Gilboa.—Pitched by a fountain.] To be near a fountain, or a copious spring of water, was of great importance, where water was scarce.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—'There were several cities called Aphek; one in Judah, one in Asher, and this in Issachar. Before, ch. 8: 4. the Philistines are said to have pitched in Shunem, and the Israelites in Gilboa; and now, one in Aphek and the other in Jezreel: not because they had now changed the place of their encamping, but because those places being very near one another, and their camps overspreading both alike, they are said promiscuously to have pitched, sometimes in one, and sometimes in the other.' Verses 4—6.

The high opinion Achish had of David, the confidence he reposed in him, and his commendations of him both before his face (9), and to the him, Surely, as [k] the LORD liveth, [l] thou hast been upright, and [m] thy going out and thy coming in with me in the host, is good in my sight; for I have not found evil in thee, since the day of thy coming unto me unto this day: nevertheless * the lords favor thee not.

7 Wherefore now return, and go in peace, that thou † displease not the lords of the Philistines.

8 And David said unto Achish, [m] But what have I done? and what hast thou found in thy servant, so long as I have been ‡ with thee unto this day, [n] that I may not go to fight against the enemies of my lord the king?

9 And Achish answered and said to David, I know that thou art good in my sight, [o] as an angel of God: notwithstanding, the princes of the Philistines have said, He shall not go up with us to the battle.

10 Wherefore [p] now rise up early in the morning, with thy master's servants that are come with thee: and as soon as ye be up early in the morning, and have light, depart.

11 So David and his men rose up early to depart in the morning, to return into the land of the Philistines. [q] And the Philistines went up to Jezreel.

the chief, and the only one that had the title of king; accordingly, in a council of war, held on this occasion, he was out-voted, and obliged to dismiss David, though extremely fond of him.

1. Achish discharges him very honorably, not finally, but only from the present service. (1.) He signifies his great pleasure and satisfaction in him, and in his conversation, v. 9. Wise and good men will gain respect, wherever they go, from all that know how to make a right estimate of persons and things, though of different professions in religion. What Achish says of David, God, by the prophet, says of the house of David, (Zech. 12: 8.) that it shall be as the angel of the Lord. But the former is a court compliment; the latter a divine promise. (2.) He gives him a testimonial of his good behavior, v. 6. very full, and in obliging terms. God's people should behave themselves always so unoffensively, as, if possible, to get the good word of all they have dealings with: and it is a debt we owe to those who have acquitted themselves well, to give them the praise of it. (3.) He lays all the blame of his dismission on the princes, who would by no means suffer him to continue in the camp. He intimates a reason why they were uneasy; it was not so much for his own sake, as for the sake of his soldiers that attended him, whom he calls his master's servants, namely, Saul's; (v. 10.) they could trust him, but not them. (4.) He orders him to be gone early, as soon as it was light, (v. 10.) to prevent their further resentments, and the jealousies they would have been apt to conceive if he had lingered.

2. His reception of this discourse is very complimental; but, I fear, not without some degree of dissimulation. No one knows how strong the temptation is to compliment and dissemble, which they are in, that attend great men, and how hard it is to avoid it.

3. God's providence ordered it wisely and graciously for him. It proved the relief of his own city, though he did not know it wanted him. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and He delighteth in his way. What He does with us, we know not now, but we shall know hereafter, and shall see it was all for good.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

While presumptuous sinners are given up to the effects of their own counsels, and driven headlong to destruction, the sins of the upright are repented of and pardoned; and the Lord takes care both of their peace and reputation. He has various methods of extricating us out of difficulties, when we can perceive no way of escaping: and while ungodly men pursue their own purposes, and follow their own judgments, He secretly influences them to such determinations, as subserve the good of his people.—Reputation, esteem, and affection, frequently become snares to us; whilst reproaches, contempt, and injurious suspicions prove beneficial: and the ill usage of the wicked, by which we are driven from them, is much better for us, than that friendship which draws us among them.—When worldly people have no evil thing to say of us, but will bear testimony to our uprightness, we need desire no more from them: and this we should aim to acquire by prudence, meekness, and a blameless life. But their flattering commendations are almost always purchased by improper compliances, or some measure of deception, and commonly may cover us with confusion.—It is seldom prudent to place great confidence in one who has changed sides; except as the fear of God influences a true convert to conscientious fidelity.—Obscurity is more safe, than a high station with the ungodly. David in the cave was far more worthy of our admiration and imitation, than when a favorite in the camp of king Achish: and he never had a greater deliverance, than when dismissed from that ensnaring service.

SCOTT.

CHAP. XXX. When David was dismissed from the army of the Philistines, he did not go over to the camp of Israel, but, being expelled by Saul, observed an exact neutrality, and silently retired to his own city Ziklag, leaving the armies ready to engage.

V. 1—6. Here is, I. The Amalekites' descent on Ziklag, in David's absence, and the desolations they made there; v. 1, 2. intending to avenge the like havoc David had lately made of them and their country, ch. 27. 8. They that made bold with others, must expect others will make as bold with them, and provide accordingly. Now observe in this, 1. The cruelty of Saul's piety (as it proved) in sparing the Amalekites; had he utterly destroyed them, as he ought to have done, these had not been in being to do this mischief. 2. How David was corrected for being so forward to go with the Philistines against Israel. God showed him he had better have staid at home, and looked after his own business. When we go abroad in the way of our duty, we may comfortably hope God will take care of our families in our absence, but not otherwise. 3. How wonderfully God inclined the hearts of these Amalekites to carry the women and children away captives, and not to kill them. When David invaded them, he put all to the sword; (ch. 27: 9.) and no reason can be given why they did not retaliate on this city, but that God restrained them; for He has all hearts in his hands, and says to the fury of the most cruel men, Hitherto thou shalt come, and no further. Thus he would use the Amalekites to correct, not to destroy the house of David.

II. The confusion and consternation David and his men were now in. The mention of David's wives, Ahinoam and Abigail, and their being carried captive, intimates that that went nearer his heart than any thing else. It is no disparagement to the boldest and bravest, to lament the calami-lords, would have been very honorable to David, if they had not been in part the effect of deception. (27: 8—12.) When Achish sware by JEHOVAH, (6) that he did not send David away for any suspicion he entertained of him, he showed that he had collected some notions at least concerning the true God and his worship. (9.) SCOTT.

Verses 8—11.

(M. R.) David could not but inwardly rejoice at this occurrence: yet he was unwilling Achish should think he did; and therefore he professed a desire 'to fight with the enemies of his lord the king.' (Note, 2 Sam. 16: 15—19.) Achish would understand these words to mean the Israelites; but they were ambiguous, as several of his speeches were on this occasion: so hard is it in such circumstances to avoid all insincerity and disingenuousness, either from fear or from courtesy! SCOTT.

(9.) 'There is some reason to think Achish had actually embraced, or was favorably disposed toward, the Jewish religion. It is possible he [as well as the king of Moab] might have learned many important truths from David, during the time he sojourned with him.' Dr. A. CLARKE. A character like that displayed in David's psalms, could not but have had much good influence on every associate; and David's intercourse, now, as well as his power afterwards, must have contributed to circulate his divine odes through every powerful nation of his times and vicinity. Note, Ex. 19: 6. ED.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1—3. It does not follow, that the battle was not fought on the morrow after Saul consulted the witch of En-dor, as some have thought; (28: 19.) for the narrative of Saul's conduct is perfectly distinct from that which relates to David and to the Philistheir wives, and their sons, and their daughters, were taken captives.

4 Then David and the people that were with him, [e] lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no more power to weep.

5 And David's [f] two wives were taken captives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail, the wife of Nabal the Carmelite.

6 And David [g] was greatly distressed; for [h] the people spake of stoning him, because the soul of all the people was * grieved, every man for his sons and for his daughters: but [i] David encouraged himself in the LORD his God.

7 And David said to [k] Abiathar the priest, Ahimelech's son, I pray thee bring me hither the ephod. And Abiathar brought thither the ephod to David.

8 And David [l] inquired at the LORD, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop? shall I overtake them? And [m] he answered him, Pursue; for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all.

9 So David went, he and the six hundred men that were with him, and came to the brook Besor, where those that were left behind stayed.

10 But David pursued, he and four hundred men: for two hundred abode behind, which were [n] so faint that they could not go over the brook Besor.

11 And they found an Egyptian in the field, and brought him to David, and [o] gave him bread, and he did eat; and they made him drink water;

12 And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins: and when he had eaten, [p] his spirit came again to him: for he had eaten no bread, nor drunk any water, [q] three days and three nights.

13 And David said unto him, To whom belongest thou? and whence art thou? and he said, I am a young man of Egypt, servant to an Amalekite; and [r] my master left me, because three days agone I fell sick.

ties of relations and friends. If, when we come off a journey, we find our tabernacles in peace, let the Lord be praised for it.

III. The mutiny and murmuring of David's men against him, v. 6. They looked upon him as the occasion of their calamities, by the provocation he had given the Amalekites, and his indiscretion in leaving Ziklag without a garrison in it. Thus apt are we, when in trouble, to fly into a rage against those who are, in any way, the occasion of our trouble, while we overlook, and have not that regard to, the operations of God's hand in it, which would silence our passions, and make us patient. Now they began to despair of that preferment which they promised themselves in following David, and threatened the life of him, on whom, under God, they had the greatest dependence. What absurdities will not ungoverned passions plunge men into! This was a sore trial to the man after God's own heart, and could not but go very near him. Great faith must expect severe exercises. But it is observable David was reduced to this extremity just before his accession to the throne; at this present time, perhaps, the stroke was struck, which opened the door to his advancement. Things are sometimes at the worst with the church and people of God, just before they begin to mend.

IV. David's pious dependence on the Divine Providence and grace, in this distress. David bore it better than his men, though he had more reason than any of them to lament it. Not offering to avenge their affront, nor terrified by their menaces, he encouraged himself in the Lord his God; believed and considered, with application to his present case, the power and providence of God, his justice and goodness, the method He commonly takes of bringing low, and then raising up; his care of his people that serve Him, and trust in Him, and the particular promises He had made to him of bringing him safe to the throne. Note, It is the duty and interest of all good people, whatever happens, to encourage themselves in God as their Lord and their God, assuring themselves that He can and will bring light out of darkness, peace out of trouble, and good out of evil, to all that love Him, and are the called according to his purpose, Rom. 8: 28. It was David's practice, and he had the comfort of it; What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee. When he was at his wit's end, he was not at his faith's end.

V. 7—20. Many were David's troubles, but the Lord delivered him out of them all; and particularly out of this which here we have an account of.

I. He inquired of the Lord both concerning his duty, and the event, v. 8. It was a great advantage, that he had the high priest with him, and the breast-plate of judgment, which, as a public person, he might consult in all his affairs, Num. 27: 21. We cannot think he left Abiathar and the ephod at Ziklag, for then he and it would have been carried away by the Amalekites, unless we may suppose them hidden by a special providence. If we conclude David had them, it was certainly a great neglect in him, not to inquire of the Lord by them, concerning his engagement to Achish. Perhaps he was ashamed to own his religion so far among the uncircumcised; but now he begins to apprehend this trouble is brought on him to correct him for that oversight; therefore he first calls for the ephod. It is well if our afflictions remind us of neglected duties, and particularly if they quicken us to inquire of the Lord. See 1 Chron. 15: 13. David had no doubt his war against these Amalekites was just, and no want of motive to carry it on, when it was for the recovery of all most dear to him in this world; yet he would not go about it without asking counsel of God, thereby owning his dependence on God, and submission to Him. If we thus, in all our ways, acknowledge God, we may expect He will direct our steps, as He did David's here, answering him above what he asked, with an assurance that he should recover all.

II. He went himself in person, and took with him all the force he had, in pursuit of the Amalekites, v. 9, 10. See how easily, and effectually, the mutiny was crushed by his patience and faith. Had he dealt with the ringleaders as had been just, it might have been of pernicious consequence in this critical juncture; but when he, as a deaf man, heard not, the tumult of the people was stilled by his gentleness, and the power of God on their hearts; and, being thus mildly treated, they are now as ready to follow his foot, as they were but a little before to fly in his face. Meekness is the security of any government.

But he had to drop a third of his men, they were so fatigued with their long march. This was, 1. A great trial of David's faith, whether he could go on, in a dependence on the word of God, when so many of his men failed him. When we are disappointed and discouraged in our expectations from second causes, then to go on with cheerfulness, confiding in the divine power, is giving glory to God, by believing against hope, in hope. 2. A great instance of David's tenderness to his men, that he would by no means urge them beyond their strength, though the cause itself was so very urgent. The Son of David thus considers the frame of his followers, who are not all alike strong and vigorous in their spiritual pursuits and conflicts; but, where we are weak, there He is kind; nay more, there He is strong, 2 Cor. 12: 9, 10.

III. Providence threw one in their way, that gave them intelligence of the enemy's motions, and guided theirs; a poor Egyptian lad, scarcely alive, is made instrumental of great good to David. God chooses the foolish things of the world, with them to confound the wise. Observe, 1. His master had barbarously left him to perish. He might have brought him home, or, at least, have left him wherewith to support himself; but, The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel: he could willingly let him die in a ditch for want of necessaries, while he was eating and drinking, v. 16. Justly did Providence make this poor servant instrumental toward the destruction of a whole army of Amalekites, and his master among the rest; for God hears the cry of oppressed servants. 2. David generously relieved him, v. 11, 12. Though the Israelites were in haste, and had no great plenty for themselves, yet they would not forbear

16 And [z]when he had brought him down, behold, they were spread abroad upon all the earth, [a]eating and drinking, and dancing, [b]because of all the great spoil that they had taken out of the land of the Philistines, and out of the land of Judah.

17 And David smote them from the twilight even unto the evening of [*]the next day: [c]and there escaped not a man of them, save four hundred young men which rode upon camels, and fled.

18 And David recovered all that the Amalekites had carried away: and David rescued his two wives.

19 And [d]there was nothing lacking to them, neither small nor great, neither sons nor daughters, neither spoil, nor any thing that they had taken to them: David recovered all.

20 And David took all the flocks and the herds, which they drave before those other cattle, and said, [e]This is David's spoil.

21 And David came to the [f]two hundred men, which were so faint that they could not follow David, whom they had made also to abide at the brook Besor: and they went forth to meet David, and to meet the people that were with him: and when David [h]came near to the people, he [†]saluted them.

22 Then answered all the [i]wicked men and men of Belial, of [‡]those that went with David, to deliver one that was drawn unto death, nor say, Behold, we know it not, Prov. 24: 11, 12. They are unworthy the name of Israelites, who shut up the bowels of their compassion from persons in distress. It was also prudent. It is a good reason why we should neither do an injury, nor deny a kindness, to any man, that we know not but, some time or other, it may be in his power to return either a kindness or an injury. David received intelligence from this poor Egyptian, concerning his party; what they had done, (v. 14.) and whither they were gone, v. 15. This he promised, on condition David would spare his life, and protect him from his master.

IV. David, being directed to the place where they lay, securely celebrating their triumphs, fell upon them, and, as he used to pray, saw his desire on his enemies.

1. The spoilers were cut off. Finding the booty rich, and being got with it (as they thought) out of the reach of danger, they were making themselves very merry with their booty, (v. 16.) eating, drinking and dancing, probably in honor of their idol-gods, to whom they gave the praise of their success. In this posture, David surprised them, which made the conquest of them the more easy to him, and the more dismal to them. Then are sinners nearest to ruin, when they cry, Peace and safety, and put the evil day far from them. Nor does any thing give our spiritual enemies more advantage against us than sensuality, and the indulgence of the flesh. Eating and drinking, and dancing, have been the soft and pleasant way in which many have gone down to the congregation of the dead. Finding them thus off their guard, and from their arms, he put them to the sword, and only 400 escaped, v. 17.

2. The spoil was recovered and brought off, and nothing was lost, but a great deal gotten. They retrieved all their own, v. 18, 19. David's two wives are mentioned particularly, because the rescue of them pleased David more than all the rest of his achievements. Providence had so ordered it, that the Amalekites carefully preserved all that they had taken; and, so it proved, there was nothing lacking, when they concluded all was gone; so much better is God oftentimes to us, than our own fears. But this was not all. They took all that belonged to the Amalekites besides, v. 20. flocks and herds; either such as were taken from the Philistines, and others which David had the disposal of by the law of war; or perhaps he made a sally into the enemy's country, and fetched off thence these flocks and herds as interest for his own. This drove was put in the van of the triumph, with the proclamation, 'This is David's spoil.' This we may thank him for.' Those who lately spake of stoning David, now caressed him, and cried him up. Thus are the world, and its sentiments, governed by interest.

V. 21—31. We have here an account of the distribution of the spoil taken from the Amalekites. What God gives us, He designs we should do good with, and not serve our lust with it. In the distribution of the spoil,

I. David was just and kind to those who abode by the stuff. They came forth to meet the conquerors, and to congratulate them on their success, though they could not contribute to it; (v. 21.) for we should rejoice in a good work done, though Providence has laid us aside, and rendered us incapable of lending a hand to it.

1. There were those that opposed their coming in to share in the spoil, v. 22. We may suppose David had instructed his soldiers, and prayed with them, yet there were many among them that were wicked men; often terrified with the apprehensions of death, and yet wicked still; very covetous, and very barbarous to their brethren, to give them the mouths without the meat. What joy could they have of their families, if they had nothing to maintain them with? Was this to do as they would be done by? These are men of Belial indeed, who delight in putting hardships upon their brethren, and care not who is starved, so they may be fed to the full.

2. David would by no means admit this, but ordered that they who tarried behind, should share equally in the spoils with those that went to the battle, v. 23, 24. This he did, (1.) In gratitude to God. We have the spoil from God, and therefore must use under his direction, as good stewards. (2.) In justice to them. True, they tarried behind; but, it was not their fault; therefore they ought not to suffer for it. Besides, they had formerly done their part well; this therefore must be considered, now that there was something to enjoy. And even now they did good service, for they abode by the stuff, as a guard. Every post is not alike honorable, yet those that are any way

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. It is wisdom on all occasions to moderate our expectation of earthly comfort; lest we should, by being too sanguine, meet with the more distressing disappointments.—Many of our troubles may be traced back to our imprudence; all of them in one way or other originate from our sins.—'The LORD is rich in mercy, and ready to forgive;' so that the greatest sinner, when first he approaches the mercy-seat in the Redeemer's name, with penitent confessions and fervent prayers, may be encouraged to expect salvation for his soul, and assistance in all his troubles. But the believer, who has long trusted in his mercy, chosen Him for his Portion, walked with Him in his ordinances, sought his glory, and experienced his faithfulness, power, and love; notwithstanding failures and conscious unworthiness, may with confidence 'encourage himself in the LORD his God,' amidst the most extreme danger and distress.—When our sins are forgiven, and we act by the Lord's direction, we shall soon recover all, and be enriched by our very losses and trials: and even if our companions cannot or will not help us, 'the LORD of hosts will be for us, the God of Jacob will be our Refuge.'—Some of those, who are cordially attached to the cause of God, are less capable of hard services than others: but He mercifully accepts them, and so should their brethren. Verses 16—19.

(M. R.) Perhaps, coming near to the Amalekites in the evening, and witnessing their riotous conduct, they took some refreshment and rest, till the morning; and then at the twilight assaulted the Amalekites, when oppressed with drunkenness and sleep: or else David's company was supernaturally strengthened for these great exertions after all their preceding fatigue. SCOTT.

and said, [k] Because they went not with us, we will not give them ought of the spoil that we have recovered, save to every man his wife and his children, that they may lead them away, and depart.

23 Then said David, Ye shall not do so, [i] my brethren, with that [m] which the LORD hath given us, [n] who hath preserved us, and delivered the company that came against us into our hand.

24 For who will hearken unto you in this matter? [o] but as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that [p] tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike.

25 And it was so from that day [*] forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel unto this day.

26 ¶ And when David came to Ziklag, he sent of the spoil unto the elders of Judah, even [q] to his friends, saying, Behold a [†] present for you of the spoil of the enemies of the LORD;

27 To them which were in [r] Beth-el, and to them which were in [s] south Ramoth, and to them which were in [t] Jattir,

28 And to them which were in [u] Aroer, and to them which were in [v] Siphmoth, and to them which were in [x] Eshtemoa,

29 And to them which were in Rachal, and to them which were in the cities of the [y] Jerahmeelites, and to them which were in the cities of the [z] Kenites,

30 And to them which were in [a] Hormah, and to them which were in Chorashan, and to them which were in Athach, 31 And to them which were in [b] Hebron, and to all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt.

serviceable to the common interest, though in a meaner station, ought to share in the common advantages; as in the natural body, every member has its use, and therefore its share of nourishment. Thus David overruled the wicked men, with reason, though with great mildness; he calls them his brethren, v. 23. Superiors often lose their authority by haughtiness, but seldom by courtesy and condescension. Thus he settled the matter for time to come, made it a statute of his kingdom, an ordinance of war, (v. 25.) that as his part is that goes down to the battle, and jeopards his life in the high places of the field, so shall his be that guards the carriages. Abraham returned the spoils of Sodom to the right owners, and quitted his title to them. If we help others recover their right, we must not think this alienates the property and makes it ours. God appointed that the spoil of Midian should be divided between the soldiers and the whole congregation, Num. 31: 27. The case here was somewhat different, but governed by the same general rule—that we are members one of another. The disciples, at first, had all things common, and we should still be ready to distribute, willing to communicate. When kings of armies did flee apace, she that tarried at home did divide the spoil.

II. David was generous and kind to all his friends. When he had given every one his own with interest, the overplus, which he had as general; probably the spoil of the tents of the Amalekites, plate and jewels; (Judg. 8: 24, 26.) those he thought fit to make presents of to his friends, even the elders of Judah, v. 26. It becomes gracious souls to be generous; there is that scatters and yet increases. And mark his gratitude: he sent presents to all the places where he and his men were wont to haunt; v. 31. naming Hebron last, as having an eye to that as fittest for his head-quarters. Note, Honesty, as well as honor, obliges us to requite the favors that have been done us, or, at least, make a real acknowledgment of them as far as is in the power of our hand. He calls it a blessing; for no present we give to our friends will be a comfort to them, but as it is made so by the blessing of God: it intimates that his prayers for them accompanied his present; also, that he sent them out of the spoil of the enemies of the Lord, (so he calls them, not his enemies,) that they might rejoice in the victory, for the Lord's sake, and join him in thanksgivings for it. He would lay them under obligation, too, to be ready to appear for him, on his accession to the throne, which he now saw at hand. A man's gift maketh room for him. He was fit to be a king, who thus showed the bounty and liberality of a king. Munificence recommends a man more than magnificence. The Ziphites had none of his presents, nor the men of Keilah; thus he showed, that, though he was such a saint as not to revenge affronts, yet he was not such a fool as not to take notice of them.

CHAP. XXXI. In the last chapter David appears a conqueror, and more than a conqueror. in this, Saul appears conquered, and more than a captive. One is set against the other, that men may see what comes of trusting in God, and what of forsaking Him.

V. 1—7. Saul must now account for the blood of the Amalekites, which he had sinfully spared, that of the priests, which he had more sinfully spilled; and that of David too, which he would have spilled. Now his day is come to fall, as David foresaw, ch. 26: 10. Come, and see the righteous judgments of God.

I. He sees his soldiers fall about him, v. 1. What advantages the Philistines had, we are not told; but they made the onset, and the Israelites fled and fell. Thus they who had followed Saul, and served him in his sin, go before him in his fall, and share with him in his plagues.

II. He sees his sons fall before him. His sons are named, (v. 2.) and Jonathan among them; so that the observation of Eliphaz does not hold, (Job 4: 7.) Who ever perished, being innocent? For here was one. What shall we say to it? 1. God would hereby complete the vexation of Saul in his dying moments, and the judgment to be executed on his house. If the family must fall, Jonathan, who is one of it, must fall with it. 2. He would hereby make David's way to the crown the more clear and open. For though Jonathan himself would have cheerfully resigned all his title

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—31. The success and abundance of ungodly men, increasing their presumption, and being spent on their lusts, frequently accelerate their destruction: and sensual indulgence is a common introduction to 'weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth.' (P. O. 2 Sam. 13: 15—39. Notes, Luke 16: 19—23.) But those, who consider the Lord as the Giver of their abundance, will dispose of it with equity and in liberality; and, instead of spending their wealth on their lusts, will share it with their friends, and with the poor; thus subserving their most important future interests, with the very 'mammon of unrighteousness!' (Luke 16: 9—13.)—Yet how far do they all come short of the Savior, who divides the spoil of his victories with the meanest of his followers! (Ps. 68: 18. Eph. 4: 11—13.) But, though the rebellious are now invited to accept of mercy and participate his favor; if they will not have Him to reign over them, they shall receive no benefit from his redemption, the blessings of which will be confined to his friends, who trust and love Him, and keep his commandments. SCOTT.

Verse 25.

'This law may seem to have been ordained before, Num. 31. but this was a very different law from that: and what was then done was not observed as a statute through all generations, but this was, till the time of the Maccabees, as appears from Macc. 8 : 28—30.'
PATRICK.

Verses 26—31.

It is evident from this, that some law or custom was established, which, in dividing the spoil, allotted a certain portion of it to the commander in the war.—It is evident, that some of the places, here mentioned, were not situated in the lot of Judah: and David had passed over Jordan, to place his parents under the protection of the king of Moab, whose kingdom was near to Aroer. (M. R. 28.) SCOTT.

(27.) South Ramoth.] 'So called, to distinguish it from Ramoth Gilead, beyond Jordan.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(31.) 'We are not to suppose that the transactions mentioned here, and in the preceding ch. took place after Saul's interview with the woman of En-dor: they were considerably antecedent to this, but how long we do not know. What is recorded in the following ch. must have taken place the next day after Saul left En-dor.' ID.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. Here the writer returns to the history, from which he had digressed in the former chapter, 1 Chron. 10: 1.
ASSEMB. ANN.

2 And the Philistines [d] followed hard upon Saul, and upon his sons; and the Philistines slew [e] Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Malchishua, [f] Saul's sons.

3 And the battle [g] went sore against Saul, and the * archers hit him; and he was sore wounded of the archers.

4 Then said Saul unto his armor-bearer, [h] Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith, lest these [i] uncircumcised come and thrust me through, and † abuse me. But his armor-bearer would not; for [j] he was sore afraid: therefore [k] Saul took a sword, and fell upon it.

5 And when [l] his armor-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise upon his sword, and died with him.

6 So [m] Saul died, and his three sons, and his armor-bearer, and all his men, that same day together.

7 ¶ And when the men of Israel that were on the other side of the valley, and they that were on the other side Jordan, saw that the men of Israel fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, [n] they forsook the cities and fled; and the Philistines came and dwelt in them.

8 And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came [o] to strip the slain, that they and interest to him, (we have no reason to suspect any other;) yet, very probably, many of the people would have used his name to support the house of Saul; or, at least, would have come in but slowly to David. If Ish-bosheth (who was now left at home as one unfit for action, and so escaped) had so many friends, what would Jonathan have had, who had been the darling of the people, and had never forfeited their favor? Besides, if Jonathan had lived, and could have prevailed to bring in all his interest to David, then it would have been said that Jonathan had made him king, whereas God was to have all the glory. This is the Lord's doing. 3. God would hereby show us, that the difference between good and bad is to be made in the other world, not in this. All things come alike to all. We cannot judge of the spiritual or eternal state of any, by the manner of their death; for in that there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked.

III. He himself is sorely wounded by the Philistines, and then slain by his own hand. The archers hit him, (v. 3.) so that he could neither fight nor fly, and now he would, 1. Die by the hand of his own servant, rather than by the hand of the Philistines, lest they should abuse him as they did Samson. Miserable man! He finds himself dying, and all his care is, to keep his body out of the hands of the Philistines, but no care to resign his soul into the hands of God who gave it. As he lived, so he died, proud and jealous, and a terror to himself and all about him. They who rightly understand themselves, think it of small account, in comparison, how it is with them in death, so it may but be well with them after death. Those are in a deplorable condition indeed, who, being bitter in soul, long for death, but it cometh not, especially those, who, despairing of the mercy of God, like Judas, leap into hell before them, to escape a hell within them. 2. When he could not obtain that favor, he became his own executioner, thinking thereby to avoid shame, but running upon a heinous sin, and with it entailing on his own name a mark of perpetual infamy, as a self-murderer. Jonathan, who received his death-wound from the hand of the Philistines, and bravely yielded to the fate of war, died in the bed of honor; but Saul as a fool, a coward, a proud fool, a sneaking coward; as a man that had neither the fear of God, nor hope in God, neither the reason of a man, nor the religion of an Israelite, nor the resolution of a soldier. Let us all pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation, this temptation. His armor-bearer would not run him through, and he did well to refuse it; for no man's servant ought to be a slave to his master's lusts or passions of any kind: the reason given is, he was sore afraid, not of death, for he himself ran wilfully upon that immediately; but he could not so far conquer his reverence for the king his master; or perhaps he feared lest his trembling hand should give him but half a blow, and so put him to the greater misery.

IV. His armor-bearer, who refused to kill him, refused not to die with him, but fell likewise upon his sword, v. 5. This was an aggravating circumstance of the death of Saul, that, by the example of his wickedness, in murdering himself, he drew in his servant to be guilty of the same wickedness, and perished not alone in his iniquity. The Jews say, Saul's armor-bearer was Doeg, whom he preferred to that dignity for killing the priests, and if so, justly does his violent dealing return on his own head. David had foretold concerning him, that God would destroy him for ever, Ps. 52: 5.

V. The country was put into such confusion by the rout of Saul's army, that the inhabitants of the neighboring cities (on that side Jordan, as it might be read) quitted them, and the Philistines, for a time, had possession of them, till things were settled in Israel, v. 7. See what a king he proved, for whom they rejected God and Samuel. They still had done wickedly (it is to be feared) as well as he, and therefore were consumed, both they and their king, as the prophet had foretold concerning them, ch. 12: 25. And to this reference is had long after; Where are thy saviors in all thy cities, of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes? I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath; that is, he was a plague to thee, living and dying: thou couldst expect no other.

V. 8—13. Scripture makes no mention of the souls of Saul and his sons, what became of them after they were dead; (secret things belong not to us;) but of their bodies only.

I. How they were basely abused by the Philistines. Finding Saul's body, they will, in that, triumph over Israel's crown, and poorly gratify a barbarous and brutish revenge, by insulting the deserted corpse, of which, when alive, they had stood in awe.

They cut off his head, stripped him of his armor, (v. 9.) and sent that to be set up, as a trophy of their victory, in the house of Ashtaroth their goddess; (v. 10.) and we are told, 1 Chron. 10: 10. (though it is omitted here,) that they fastened his head in the temple of Dagon. Thus Ashtaroth, the idol, that Israel had many a time gone a whoring after, now triumphs over them. They sent expresses throughout their country, and ordered public notice to be given in the houses of their gods, of the victory they had obtained, (v. 9.) that public rejoicings might be made, and thanks given to their gods. This David regretted sorely; (2 Sam. 1: 20.) Tell it not in Gath. They fastened his body, and the bodies of his sons, (as appears, v. 12.) to the wall of Bethshan; a city not far from Gilboa, and very near to the river Jordan: here they were hung up in chains, to be devoured by the birds of prey. Saul slew himself, to avoid being abused by the Philistines, and never was royal corpse so abused as his. He that thinks to save his honor by sin, will certainly lose it. See to what a height of insolence the Philistines were arrived, just before David was raised up, who perfectly subdued them. When God has accomplished his whole work by them, He will accomplish it upon them. See Isa. 10: 6, 7.

Ahithophel and Judas the traitor murdered themselves: (Notes, 2 Sam. 17: 23. Matt. 27: 3—5.) and I do not recollect any other instances in Scripture of this practice; unless Abimelech be added, who, when mortally wounded, ordered his armor-bearer to despatch him; and Zimri, who burnt his palace and himself in it. (M. R.) For suicide, whether from real or supposed insanity, or otherwise, seems to have very rarely occurred in Israel; while suicide among the Greeks and Romans, and other Gentiles, was considered as virtue, and never ascribed to insanity. So that the very numerous instances of self-murder, in this and other Christian countries, and generally considered as lunacy, have, in fact, no parallel, either in Israel, or among idolaters; and seem to be occasioned in this peculiar form, by an association of the Christian sentiment, that suicide is crime and murder, with a vain attempt in all parties to extenuate it, by ascribing it to madness. But when the character of the suicides mentioned in Scripture is considered, it confirms the opinion, which has been advanced, of the enormous guilt and direful consequences of this crime. (Ex. 20: 13.) Men, either madly presuming on the mercy of God, or despairing of it, in order to escape temporal sufferings or disgrace, despise his gift of life, and thus rush uncalled unto his tribunal, by an act of direct rebellion against his authority, and in proud defiance of his justice, with the guilt of all their unrepented crimes on their heads! Yet so exceedingly has Satan blinded men's minds, that this worst of murders has been held honorable in very many ages, places, and situations, and has often been committed out of vain glory, in imitation of, or from affection to, those who have obtained renown among their fellow sinners.—Saul's sons and servants died in the performance of their duty to him and to their country: but he and his armor-bearer died in direct violation of God's commandment. SCOTT.

(4.) Took a sword.] 'Took the sword, that is, his armor-bearer's. If Doeg were his armor bearer, then Saul and his executioner both fell by that weapon, with which they had before massacred the priests of God. So Brutus and Cassius killed themselves with the same swords, with which they stabbed Cæsar; and Calippus was stabbed with the same sword, with which he stabbed Dio.' DELANY, in Dr. A. Clarke.

found Saul and his three sons fallen in mount Gilboa.

9 And [p] they [q] cut off his head, and stripped off his armor, and sent into the land of the Philistines round about, [q] to publish it in the house of their idols, and among the people.

10 And [r] they put his armor in the house of [s] Ashtaroth; and they fastened his body to the wall of [t] Beth-shan.

11 And when the inhabitants of [u] Jabesh-gilead heard [*] of that which the Philistines had done to Saul, 12 All the valiant men arose, and went all night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, from the wall of Beth-shan, and came to Jabesh, and [x] burnt them there.

13 And they took [y] their bones, and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and [z] fasted seven days.

p 4. 17:51,54. 1 Chr. 10:9,10.

Jordan lay between Beth-shan and Jabesh-gilead, and Jordan was here fordable; by a bold adventure, the valiant men of that city passed the river in the night, took down the bodies, and gave them decent burial, v. 11—13. This they did out of a common concern for the honor of Israel, and out of a particular sense of gratitude to Saul, for his zeal and forwardness to rescue them from the Ammonites, when he first came to the throne, ch. 11. They had done Saul better service, had they sent their valiant men to him sooner, to strengthen him against the Philistines. But his day was come to fall, and now this is all the service they can do, in honor to his memory.

We find no general mourning made for Saul, as for Samuel, (ch. 25: 1.) only those Gileadites of Jabesh did him honor at his death; for, (1.) They made a burning for the bodies, to perfume them; (so some;) burnt spices over them, v. 12. And that it was usual thus to honor deceased friends, at least, princes, appears by the account of Asa's funeral, (2 Chron. 16: 14.) that they made a very great burning for him. Or, (as some,) they burnt the flesh because it began to putrefy. (2.) They buried the bodies, when, by burning over them, they had sweetened them, (or, if they burnt them, they buried the bones and ashes,) under a tree, which served for a monument. And, lastly, they fasted seven days; i. e. each day of the seven, they fasted till the evening; thus they lamented the death of Saul, and the present distracted state of Israel, and perhaps prayed therewithal for the re-establishment of their shattered state. Though when the wicked perish, there is shouting, i. e. it is to be hoped a better state of things will ensue, which will be matter of joy; yet humanity obliges us to show a decent respect to dead bodies, especially those of princes. This book began with Samuel's birth, and now ends with Saul's burial, the comparing of which together will teach us to prefer the honor that comes from God, before any honors of which this world pretends to dispose.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How should we watch and pray, that we may not be given up to presumption or despair; but enabled patiently to bear the evils of life, and quietly to hope for the salvation of the Lord, that Satan may not tempt us to the horrible sin of self-murder!—To be anxious to avoid pain or disgrace from men, and not to 'fear Him who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell,' is the extreme of infatuation and impiety: yet even here also, ungodly men are often disappointed. Indeed, every worldly object inordinately craved, will become our trouble; and its desire, possession, and loss will all be sources of uneasiness! SCOTT.

(10.) To the wall.] Hooks are still seen on the outside walls of 'Fort Emperor,' the citadel of Algiers, on which naked criminals were thrown, and exposed both alive and dead. And see Dr. Shaw. The preservation of trophies of enemies in temples erected to the Deity, is still kept up; witness the flags, &c. now in the 'church of Alexander,' and other churches in St. Petersburg, 'St. Paul's' London, 'St. John's' Malta, that of the 'Hotel of the Invalids,' Paris, &c. ED.

(13.) Probably they burned the bodies, lest the Philistines should further abuse them: though burning was not customary, it was not prohibited. SCOTT. It was the Jews' custom to embalm, not burn, their dead and in parallel texts there is no mention of burning any thing but bones or bodies, except Am. 6: 10. might imply more, which, however, relates to a period 270 years after.—The word 'bones' frequently means the same with 'corpse.' Thus Joseph's embalmed body is called 'his bones,' Gen. 1: 25,26. Ex. 13: 19. So the lying prophet terms his body. 1 K. 13: 31. HEWLETT.

CAUSES OF THE FATAL DISSENSIONS OF THE HEBREW UNION.

Among 12 republics connected with each other, jealousies could not but sometimes arise; and less interests thereby stand in the way of the general welfare. The examples of Holland and Switzerland authorize us to believe this would be the case; and to confirm it I need not appeal to the constitution of the German empire, which, from the inequality of its constituent parts, is perpetually distracted by divisions, and often the scene of intestine hostilities. This mischievous jealousy would infallibly break out in Israel, (1.) If any two tribes became more powerful [or richer] than the others, in which event they would regard each other with suspicion and hatred; and, (2.) If any one tribe acquired considerable ascendency over the rest, of which the consequence would be mutual envy and opposition.

In the Israelitish republic, both cases actually occurred; and this forms, as it were, the key to their whole history. As they entered Palestine 600,000 strong, 50,000 obviously formed the medium number of each tribe. A tribe numbering more was to be accounted 'strong;' if less, 'weak.' Thus, at the 2d census, Num. 26: Joseph having 35,200, Judah, 76,000, Issachar, 64,300, Zebulun, 60,500, Ashur, 53,400, were all 'strong' tribes. Dan having 46,400, Benjamin, 45,600, Naphtali, 45,400, Reuben, 43,730, Gad, 40,500, were 'weak' tribes. And Simeon who had but 22,200 was 'very weak.' From this it appears, that Judah and Joseph then rose very far above the medium strength. Joseph, indeed, on account of extraordinary numbers, and other advantages, was split into two half-tribes, of which the one, afterwards most turbulent, was now but weak, compared with the other; having but 32,500 warriors. Both, however, were still regarded in some measure as one tribe: and Ephraim must at this time have enjoyed some pre-eminences. These were probably founded merely on the predictions, (Gen. 48:19, 20. Deut. 33:17.) concerning his future extraordinary increase; or perhaps also, on birth, inasmuch as Joseph was by far the most illustrious among his brethren; or, again, because the tabernacle was to be at Shiloh, in Ephraim. Thus much appears from the history, that the pre-eminences which might have belonged to the tribe of Joseph at large, passed, as if by compact, to Joseph's younger son, Ephraim, and his descendants. From this period, between Ephraim and Judah we find a perpetual emulation. (See Verschuir's Diss.) In the wilderness, Moses gave Judah the preference, assigning to that tribe the first place in the camp. But immediately after his death, Ephraim gave the nation a leader in Joshua. While the tabernacle was so long at Shiloh, in Ephraim, that tribe obtained considerable advantages, not only in honor and respect, but in wealth and increase of numbers. For, wherever the whole people were assembled thrice a year to the high festivals, trade would increase, and, of course, marriages become more frequent. Ps. 78. represents Ephraim as the chief tribe; which, however, God is afterwards said to have rejected, when the ark and kingdom were transferred to Judah. But even while Ephraim continued powerful, Judah enjoyed a more extensive sway than the other tribes on this side Jordan. At last, Israel received a king from the weakest and youngest tribe, Benjamin. This was, in some measure, giving no preference to any tribe; for, by its disasters, (see Judg.) Benjamin had been extremely reduced, and could not boast of superiority. Only, because Benjamin and Joseph were of one mother, the Benjamites, as from their origin might be expected, included themselves in Joseph. Thus, although Shimei was of Benjamin, he said (2 Sam. 19:20.) he was the first of the house of Joseph that met David in his return. Ephraim, therefore, still maintained a degree of pre-eminence, while Saul the Benjamite was king: for then Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, (see Ps. 80. composed at that time,) seem the chief tribes. Under Saul, the rivalship of the tribes was remarkably displayed. In Judah, he could not have had great authority; for he traversed it often in search of David, who long found no reason to flee farther than from one end of it to another, and was at last but the victim of a rash resolution, when he fled out of the land altogether. Saul, on the other hand, was, as a king, extremely partial to his own tribe, and owned it; See 1 Sam. 22:7. 'Hear, ye Benjamites; will the son of Jesse give all of you fields and vineyards, and make all of you captains of thousands and of hundreds?'—thus acknowledging that he did so, and counting on it as a claim to their gratitude. Saul fell; and David was at first recognised only by Judah; the other tribes still attaching themselves to Saul's family. But David's magnanimity so excited their admiration and love, that they all by degrees voluntarily submitted to his government. [And Geddes thinks, that 'relic of genuine elegiac poetry, the most precious of all antiquity, (2 Sam. 1:19—27.) containing an artful panegyric of Saul, his avowed enemy, and taught to Judah, could not but have been thus a powerful engine of reconciliation.'] Judah now became exceedingly powerful; and it was remarked above, that its numbers multiplied greatly, most probably by proselytes. About this period began the distinction of 'Israel' and 'Judah,' 2 Sam. 19:12,42—44. 20:1,2. Such titles could not but give birth to jealousies among a people, whose ideas were always influenced by genealogical considerations. David, indeed, most judiciously chose for his residence a city (Jerusalem) properly belonging to Benjamin, but close to Judah, long inhabited principally by men of that tribe, and accounted their chief city. This was well calculated to unite the Benjamites more closely with his family, and to extinguish, perhaps, the jealousies of the rival tribes. We find, nevertheless, not only a Benjamite (Shimei) transported with joy on David's flight from Absalom, but also a strife between Judah and the other tribes, as to which should recall him. This had well nigh occasioned the revolt of the eleven tribes from David; and here too, the prime mover was of Benjamin; 2 Sam. 16:5—8. 19:10—16. 20:1. All the tribes, for at least 73 yrs. continued in submission, first to David, and then to Solomon, kings of the house of Judah; yet the fire was all the while glowing under the ashes; and in consequence of the imprudent declaration of Rehoboam, Solomon's son, Jeroboam, an Ephraimite, began a revolt, when, in one day, ten whole tribes renounced allegiance to the kings of Judah, and had thenceforth a king of their own, always of Ephraim, though from different families. Benjamin alone, by David's policy noticed above, remained to Judah, forming one kingdom.' MICHAELIS.

AN EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, AND NOTES,

UPON THE SECOND BOOK OF

SAMUEL.

THIS book is the history of the reign of David. We had, in the foregoing book, an account of his designation to the government, and his struggles with Saul, which ended at length in the death of his persecutor. This book begins with his accession to the throne, and is entirely taken up with the affairs of the government during the 40 years he reigned, and therefore is entitled, by the Seventy, The Second Book of the Kings. It gives us an account of David's triumphs and his troubles

I. His triumphs over the house of Saul; (ch. 1—4) over the Jebusites and Philistines; (ch. 5.) at the bringing up of the ark; (ch. 6 and 7.) over the neighboring nations that opposed him, ch. 8—10. And so far the history is agreeable to what we might expect from David's character, and the choice made of him. But his cloud has a dark side.

II. We have his troubles, the cause of them, his sin in the matter of Uriah, (ch. 11 and 12.) The troubles themselves from the sin of Amnon, (ch. 13.) the rebellion of Absalom, (ch. 14—19.) and of Sheba, (ch. 20.) and the plague in Israel for his numbering the people, (ch. 24.) beside the famine for the Gibeonites, (ch. 21.) His song we have, (ch. 22.) and his words and worthies, ch. 23. Many things in this history are very instructive; but for the subject of it, though, in many instances, he appears here very great, very good, and very much the favorite of Heaven, yet it must be confessed his honor shines brighter in his Psalms than in his Annals. HENRY.

Perhaps this book was named Samuel, because he anointed that king whose actions it records; or because the prophets by whom it was written were raised up in those seminaries, which he instituted.—The book most evidently continues the preceding narrative, and introduces that which follows: and its authenticity is considered as undoubted in every subsequent part of Scripture. The Psalms abound with references to the events recorded in it. (Ps. 3: title. 72. 78: 70—72: 89: 19—36. 132:) The narrative of David's fall in the matter of Uriah, related only in this book, is mentioned in other parts of Scripture. (1 Kings 15: 5. Ps. 51: title. Matt. 1: 6.) In short, wherever the covenant made with David, concerning the regal authority, as perpetuated in his family, and at length inherited by the Messiah to descend from him; or the promises made respecting Solomon, the especial type of Christ; or the Lord's choice of Jerusalem, and of mount Zion, as the place of his sanctuary, to which the Israelites should resort; or the building and continuance of the temple there, are mentioned; the events recorded in this book are divinely attested.—As containing the history of almost the whole of David's reign, and exclusively that of many important transactions, during this interesting period, there are perhaps more references directly or indirectly made to it in other parts of the Scripture, than to any other portion of the sacred narrative. The promises made to David were, both in the literal and typical sense of them, evident prophecies, the fulfilment of which, as recorded in the subsequent books of Scripture, and in the history of the church and kingdom of Christ even to this day, are a divine attestation, that it was written by inspiration of that God, 'to whom are known all his works from the beginning of the world.'—(7: 22: 23: 1—7.) CHAP. I.

An Amalekite brings Saul's crown and bracelet to David, informs him of the event of the battle, and asserts that he slew Saul, 1—10. David rends his clothes, weeps, and orders the messenger to be put to death as a murderer, 11—16. His poetical lamentation for Saul and Jonathan, 17—27.

NOW it came to pass after the death of Saul, [a] when David was returned from the slaughter of the Amalekites, and David had abode two days in [b] Ziklag;

2 It came even to pass on [c] the third day, that, behold, [d] a man came out of the camp from Saul, with [e] his clothes rent, and [f] earth upon his head: and so it was, when he came to David, that [g] he fell to the earth, and did obeisance.

3 And David said unto him, [h] From whence comest thou? And he said unto him, Out of the camp of Israel [i] am I escaped.

CHAP. I. V. 1—10. Here is, I. David settling again in Ziklag his own city, v. 1. Thence he was now sending presents, to his friends, 1 Sam. 30: 26. and there he was ready to receive those that came into his interests; persons of quality in their country, mighty men, men of war, and captains of thousands, as we find, 1 Chron. 12: 1, 8, 20. God stirred up their hearts to do so, till he had a great host, like the host of God, as it is said there, v. 22. The secret springs of revolutions are unaccountable, and must be resolved into that Providence, which turns all hearts as the rivers of water.

II. Intelligence brought him hither of the death of Saul. It was strange he did not leave some spies, to bring him notice of the issues of the engagement, a sign that he desired not Saul's woful day, nor was impatient to come to the throne.

The messenger presents himself to David as an express, in the posture of a mourner for the deceased prince, and a subject to the succeeding one, (v. 2.) pleasing himself that he had the honor to be the first to do him homage as his sovereign; but it proved he was the first to receive from him sentence of death, as his judge. David was very desirous to know the issue of the battle, as one that had more reasons than any to be concerned for the public; and he told him Israel was routed, many slain, and, among the rest, Saul and Jonathan, v. 4. He names these only, because he knew David would be most solicitous to know their fate; Saul as the man whom he most feared, and Jonathan as the man whom he most loved.

Probably David had heard, by others, what the CHAP. I. V. 1. David and his men had returned to Ziklag, and probably were employed in repairing its desolations, when tidings were brought him of the death of Saul. It does not appear that he made much inquiry concerning the event of the war, though he had every reason to be anxious about it. The decisive blow must have been given about the time when he was so exceedingly distressed. (1. Sam. 30: 1—6.) SCOTT.

Verses 2—10.

As it is expressly said, that the armor-bearer saw that Saul was dead, before he slew himself, (1 Sam. 31: 5.) we must conclude that this man feigned many circumstances of his story. But happening to pass by the field of battle, and finding Saul's dead body, with the insignia of royalty on it, or near to it, he knew who it was; and by bringing these away he sufficiently proved Saul's death. He therefore framed his story, and ordered his behavior, in that manner which he supposed would most ingratiate him with David.—It is remarkable, that an Amalekite should boast of having slain Saul, who had been rejected for not punctually executing the command of God, concerning that nation. (1 Sam. 15: 18—23. 28: 18.) But this rendered the story the more improbable; for it might well be supposed, that Saul would be as unwilling to be slain by an Amalekite, as by a Philistine.—Anguish. (9) The marginal reading seems the true meaning of the original. SCOTT.

(2.) A man out of the camp of Saul.] Dr. A. Clarke very plausibly suggests, that 'he was one of those wretches who hang on the skirts of camps, and after a battle rob the slain.' ED.

4 And David said unto him, * How went the matter? I pray thee tell me. And he answered, That [k]the people are fled from the battle, and many of the people also are fallen and dead, and Saul and Jonathan his son are dead also.

5 And David said unto the young man that told him [l]How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan his son be dead?

6 And the young man that told him said, As [m]I happened by chance upon [n]mount Gilboa, behold, [o]Saul leaned upon his spear; and lo, the chariots and horsemen followed hard after him.

7 And when he looked behind him, he saw me, and called unto me: and I answered, † Here am I.

8 And he said unto me, Who art thou! And I answered him, I am [p]an Amalekite.

9 He said unto me again, Stand, I pray thee, upon me, and slay me; for ‡ anguish is come upon me, because my life is yet whole in me.

10 So I stood upon him, and [q]slew him, because I was sure that he could not live after that he was fallen: and I took [r]the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was on his arm, and have brought them hither unto my lord.

11 Then David took hold on his clothes, and [s]rent them, and [t]likewise all the men that were with him.

issue of the war was, for multitudes resorted to him, it should seem, in consequence; but he was desirous to know the certainty of it concerning Saul and Jonathan, either because he was not forward to believe it, or because he would not proceed upon it, to make his own claims, till he was fully assured of it. The young man, therefore, puts it past doubt that Saul was dead, for he himself had been an instrument of his death, therefore David might rely on his testimony. He says nothing of Jonathan, knowing how ungrateful his death would be to David, but accounts only for Saul, thinking (as David understood it well enough, ch. 4: 10.) that he should be welcome for that, and rewarded, as one that brought good tidings.

I. His account is very particular: that he happened to go to the place where Saul was, (v. 6.) as a passenger, not as a soldier, and therefore an indifferent person; that he found Saul endeavoring to run himself through with his own spear. The margin reads the phrase, Anguish is come upon me, as a complaint of the inconvenience of his clothes; his coat of mail, or his embroidered coat, hindered him, that he could not get the spear far enough into his body, or so straitened him, now that his body swelled with anguish, that he could not expire. Let no man's clothes be his pride, for they may be his burden and snare. 'Hereupon,' saith our young man, 'I stood upon him, and slew him;' (v. 10.) at which word, perhaps, he observed David look with displeasure, and therefore excuses it, in the next words; 'for I was sure he could not live; his life was whole in him indeed, but he would certainly have fallen into the hands of the Philistines, or given himself another thrust.'

2. It is doubtful whether this story be true. If it was, the righteousness of God is to be observed, that Saul, who spared the Amalekites, in contempt of the divine command, received his death wound from an Amalekite. But most interpreters think it false, and that he told it to David, in expectation that he would have rewarded him, as having done him a good service. They who rejoice at the fall of an enemy, are apt to measure others by themselves, and to think they will do so too. But a man after God's own heart, is not to be judged of by common men. I am not clear whether this young man's story were true or no; it may consist with the narrative in the ch. before, and be an addition to it, as Peter's account of the death of Judas, Acts 1: 18. is to the narrative, Mat. 27: 5. What is there called a sword, may here be called a spear; or, when he fell on his sword, he leaned on his spear.

3. However, he produced what was proof sufficient of the death of Saul, his crown and bracelet. These Saul was so foolishly fond of, as to wear in the field of battle, which made him a fair mark for the archers; but as pride (we say) feels no cold, so it fears no danger from that which gratifies it. Saul spared the best of the Amalekite's spoil, and now the best of his came to one of that devoted nation. He brought them to David, as the rightful owner of them now that Saul was dead, not doubting but, by his officiousness herein, to recommend himself to the best preferments in his court or camp. The tradition of the Jews, that this Amalekite was the son of Doeg, is a groundless conceit; Doeg's son, it is likely, was so well known to Saul, that he needed not ask him as he did, (v. 8.) Who art thou? David had been long waiting for the crown, and now it is brought him by an Amalekite. See how God can serve his own purpose of kindness to his people, even by designing (ill-designing) men, who aim at nothing but to set up themselves.

V. 11—16. I. So far was David from falling into a transport of joy, as the Amalekite expected, that he falls into a passion of weeping, rent his clothes, (v. 11.) mourned and fasted, (v. 12.) not only for his people Israel, and Jonathan his friend, but for Saul his enemy. This he did, not only as a man of honor, in observance of that decorum which forbids us to insult over the fallen, and requires us to attend our relations to the grave with respect, whatever we lost by their life, or got by their death; but as a good man, and a man of conscience, that had forgiven Saul's injuries, and bore him no malice. He knew before his son wrote it, that if we rejoice when our enemy falls, the Lord sees it, and it displeases Him; and, that he who is glad at calamities, shall not go unpunished. By this it appears, that those passages in David's psalms, which express his desire of, and triumph in, the ruin of his enemies, proceed not from a spirit of revenge, or any irregular passion, but from a holy zeal for the glory of God and the public good; for by what he did here, when he heard of Saul's death, we may perceive his natural temper was very tender, and he kindly affected even to those that hated him. He was very sincere, and his passion so strong, on this occasion, that it moved those about him; probably, it was a religious fast, they humbled themselves under the hand of God, and prayed for the repairing of the breaches made upon Israel by this defeat.

II. The reward he gave to him that brought the tidings; instead of preferring him, he put him to death: judged him, out of his own mouth, as a murderer of his prince, and ordered him forthwith to be executed for the same.

Now, 1. David herein did justly. For, (1.) The man was an Amalekite. This, he made him own a second time, v. 13. That nation, and all that belonged to it, were doomed to destruction; so that, in slaying him, David did what his predecessor should have done, and was rejected for not doing. (2.) He did himself confess the crime, so that the evidence was, by the consent of all laws, sufficient to convict him; for every man is presumed to make the best of himself: and by boasting of it to David, he showed what opinion he had of him, that he would rejoice in it, as one altogether like himself, which was an intolerable affront to him, who had once and again refused to stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed. And his lying to David, if indeed it were a lie, was highly criminal, and proved, as sooner or later that sin will prove, lying against his own head.

2. He did honorably and well. Hereby he demonstrated the sincerity of his grief; discouraged all others from thinking, by doing the like, to ingratiate themselves with him; and did what might, probably, oblige the house of Saul, win upon them, and recommend him to the people, as one zealous for public justice, without regard to private interest. We may learn from it, that to give assistance to any in murdering themselves, directly or indirectly, if done wittingly, incurs the guilt of blood; and that the lives of princes ought to be, in a special manner, precious to us.

V. 17—27. We have here a poem David wrote on the occasion of Saul's death; by which he designed both to express his own sorrow for this great calamity, and to impress the like on the minds of others, who ought to lay it to heart.

I. The orders David gave with this elegy, v. 18. Not but that the children of Judah knew how to use the bow; but, perhaps, they had of late made more use of slings, as David, in killing Goliath, because cheaper; now, 1. David would have them return to the use of the bow, that they might be in a capacity to avenge the death of their prince on the Philistines, and to outdo them at their own weapon, 1 Sam. 31: 3. David hereby showed his authority over, and concern for, the armies of Israel, and set himself to rectify the errors of the former reign. But we find that the companies now come to David to Ziklag, were armed with bows; (1 Chron. 12: 2.) therefore, 2. Some understand it, either of some musical instrument called a bow, to which he would have the mournful ditties sung, or, of the elegy itself; he bade them teach the children of

1. He was very generous to Saul, his sworn enemy. (1.) He conceals his faults: Charity teaches us to make the best we can of every body; and those we can say no good of, to say nothing of, especially when they are gone. (2.) He celebrates what was praise-worthy in him. He does not commend him for what he was not; says nothing of his piety, or fidelity; those funeral commendations, which are gathered out of the spoils of truth, are not at all to the praise of those on whom they are bestowed, but very much the dispraise of those who unjustly misplace them. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. Many secretly wish for the death of those who keep them from honors or estates, without excepting even their nearest relations; but the grace of God subdues this base disposition, and the true believer does not allow himself to desire, or to rejoice in, the calamity or death of a rival or an enemy; (Note, Prov. 24: 17, 18.) much less of a kind and superior relation. Nor can he exult in the prospect of worldly advancement; for he considers himself as by it intrusted with more talents, surrounded by greater temptations, and called to increasing cares, duties, and burdens. Those therefore will be deceived, who court his favor, as sycophants, and will meet with a rebuke, and perhaps punishment, where they expected a large reward: and this treatment of such mercenary men promises a useful and honorable possession of worldly pre-eminence. Verses 19—27.

This elegy contains little directly relating to religion; but it is highly poetical. The wish that neither rain nor dew might fructify the fields, on which the fatal battle was fought; and that no sacrifices might thence be brought to the altar of God, because there the anointed of the LORD had cast away his shield, as a common soldier, is a strong expression of regret. The harmony, which generally subsisted between Saul and Jonathan, in warring against the enemies of Israel; their impetuosity and fury; and their falling in the same battle, are touched in a very poetical manner. Probably Saul had encouraged the manufactures of Israel, and perhaps had increased their wealth: the daughters of Israel therefore, as most delighted with external embellishment, are called upon to lament over their prince. Every thing is mentioned in his commendation, which truth permitted: but Jonathan is named with most passionate affection; as having fallen upon the high places, where he had often successfully displayed his valor; and as having shown a strong and faithful affection, in such trying circumstances, and in so disinterested a manner, as could not be equalled by any instances of conjugal fidelity, or the most constant love which had ever subsisted between the sexes. (19—27.) 'This inimitable lamentation is justly admired as a picture of distress, the most tender and the most striking; unequally divided by grief into longer and shorter breaks, as nature could pour them forth from a mind interrupted by the alternate recurrences of the most lively images of love and greatness. It is almost impossible to read the noble original without finding every word swollen with a sigh, or broken with a sob. A heart eloquent with distress, and striving to utter expressions descriptive of its feelings, (which are repeatedly interrupted by an excess of grief,) is most sensibly painted throughout the whole.' CHAP. II.

David, by divine direction, goes with his company to Hebron, and is anointed king over Judah, 1—4. He commends the men of Jabesh-gilead for their kindness to Saul, 5—7. Abner sets up Ish-bosheth as king over Israel, 8—11. Twelve of Abner's men, and twelve of Joab's, engage in a fatal contest, which brings on a battle, in which Israel is vanquished, 12—17. Asahel, Joab's brother, is slain by Abner, 18—24. At Abner's desire Joab sounds a retreat, 25—29. The number of the slain, 30, 31. Asahel's burial, 32.

the affections of his subjects, v. 23. Jonathan was always so, and Saul as long as he concurred with him; and in the pursuit of the enemy, never were men more bold, more brave, swifter than eagles, and stronger than lions: a rare composition of softness and sharpness they had, which makes many a man's temper very happy. It may be understood of the harmony and affection, that, for the most part, subsisted between Saul and Jonathan; they were lovely and pleasant one to another: Jonathan a dutiful son, Saul an affectionate father, and therefore dear to each other in their lives, and in their death they were not divided, but fell together in the same cause. He had enriched his country with the spoils of conquered nations, and introduced a more splendid attire. Herein he was, in a particular manner, obliging to his female subjects, v. 24.

2. He was very grateful to Jonathan, his sworn friend, and mentions him with marks of distinction: (v. 25.) O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places! which, compared with v. 19. intimates that he meant him by the beauty of Israel, which, he there says, was slain upon the high places. He laments Jonathan as his particular friend; (v. 26.) not so much for what he would have been to him if he had lived, but for what he had been. He had reason to say, Jonathan's love to him was wonderful; sure never was the like, for a man to love one who he knew was to take the crown over his head; and to be so faithful to his rival: this far surpassed the highest degree of conjugal affection and constancy. Nothing is more delightful in this world than a true friend, that is wise and good, that kindly receives and returns our affection, and is faithful to us in all our true interests. Nothing more distressful than the loss of such a friend. It is the vanity of this world, that what is most pleasant to us, we are most liable to be distressed in.

3. He was deeply concerned for the honor of God; which he has an eye to, when he fears lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph over Israel, and the God of Israel, v. 20. Good men are touched very sensibly by the reproaches of them that reproach God.

4. He was deeply concerned for the public welfare. It was the beauty of Israel that was slain, (v. 19.) and the honor of the public that was disgraced; the mighty are fallen, that is three times lamented, (v. 19, 25, 27.) and so the strength of the people is weakened. Public losses are most laid to heart by men of public spirit.

David here shews himself also to be a man of a fine imagination, as well as wise and holy. The expressions are all excellent, and calculated to work upon the passions. He is truly elegant when he says, (v. 20.) Tell it not in Gath; and the curse he entails on the mountains of Gilboa, the theatre on which this tragedy was acted, Let there be no dew upon you, nor fields of offerings, v. 21. is a poetical strain, like that of Job, Let the day perish wherein I was born. Not as if David wished any part of the land of Israel might be barren, but, the mountains of Gilboa having been stained with royal blood, thereby forfeited celestial dews. In this elegy, Saul had a more honorable interment, than that the men of Jabesh-gilead gave him.

CHAP. II. Here we have an account of a civil war in Israel, which, in process of time, ended in the complete settlement of David on the throne.

V. 1—7. When Saul and Jonathan were dead, though David knew himself anointed to be king, and now saw his way very clear, yet he did not immediately send messengers through all the coasts of Israel, to summon all people to come in and swear allegiance to him, on pain of death, but proceeded leisurely; for he that believeth, doth not make haste; and he that will rule with meekness, will not rise with violence. Observe here,

I. He doubted not of success, yet he uses proper means, both divine [v. 1.] and human, [v. 5—7.] Assurance of hope in God's promise, so far from slackening, will quicken pious endeavors. 1. David, according to the precept, acknowledged God in his way: inquired by the breast-plate of judgment, Abiathar brought. We must apply to God, not only when in distress, but even when the world smiles on us, and second causes work in our favor. 'Shall I go up?' God, according to the promise, directed his path. Hebron, a priest's city, with the sepulchres of the patriarchs adjoining, would remind him of the ancient promise, on which God had caused him to hope. God sent him, not to Beth-lehem his own city, because that was little among the thousands of Judah; but to Hebron, a more considerable place, and which, perhaps, was then as the county town of that tribe.

II. His care of his family and friends in his remove, v. 2, 3. It does not appear, that as yet he had any children; his first-born was in Hebron, ch. 3: 2. His friends and followers had accompanied him in his wanderings, therefore, when he gained a settlement, they settled with him: so to those who continue with Christ in his temptations, He appoints a kingdom, and will feast them at his own table.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—27. The faults even of our enemies should not be needlessly exposed, and the offices and rank of distinguished persons are entitled to respect, though their characters do not deserve our esteem.—Useful endowments are conferred on numbers who are destitute of true piety; and it is in some cases allowable and decent to give them due commendation: yet we must on no account praise them for virtues which they do not possess.—The calamities of the Lord's people, and the triumphs of his enemies, always grieve the hearts of true believers; and it would be well, if many things which continually occur among professed Christians could be concealed from infidels and profligates, who are exceedingly hardened and emboldened by them. But it is not enough to conceal offences. Indeed the wish to do it is vain, and the thing itself generally impracticable: nay, the very endeavor often increases the mischief; being considered as an effort to connive at or palliate evil conduct, in those of our own creed or party. And, at the same time, the hope of escaping disgrace decreases resistance in the hour of temptation; and so multiplies the scandals themselves. We must therefore watch and pray against them, and use all our influence to prevent them. Let us then learn to repress ambition, resentment, and self-love; and to exercise patience, meekness, gratitude to our benefactors, love to our country, and good-will to men; with zeal for the glory of God, and the interests of true religion. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Hebron.] 'One of the richest regions in Judea. The mountains of Hebron were famed for fruits, herbage, and honey; and many parts were well adapted for vines, olives, and different kinds of grain, and abounding in springs of excellent water, as the most accurate travellers assert.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

3 And [d] his men that were with him did David bring up, every man with his household: and they dweit in [e] the cities of Hebron.

4 And [f] the men of Judah came, and there they [g] anointed David king over the house of Judah. And they told David, saying, That [h] the men of Jabesh-gilead were they that buried Saul.

5 And David sent messengers unto the men of Jabesh-gilead, and said unto them, [i] Blessed be ye of the LORD, that ye have showed this kindness unto your lord, even unto Saul, and have buried him.

6 And now [k] the LORD show kindness and truth unto you: and [l] I also will requite you this kindness, because ye have done this thing.

7 Therefore now [m] let your hands be strengthened, and be ye * valiant: for your master Saul is dead, and also the house of Judah have anointed me king over them.

8 ¶ But [n] Abner the son of Ner, captain of † Saul's host, took [o] Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, and brought him over to [p] Mahanaim;

9 And made him king over [q] Gilead, and over the [r] Ashurites, and over Jezreel, and over Ephraim, and over Benjamin, and over all Israel.

10 Ish-bosheth Saul's son was forty years old when he began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years: but the house of Judah followed David.

11 And [s] the ‡ time that David was king in Hebron over the house

III. The honor done him by the men of Judah, v. 4. Judah had often stood by itself, more than any other of the tribes; (1 Sam. 15: 4.) and had been used to act separately; they did so now; they did not pretend to anoint him king over all Israel, (as Judg. 9: 22.) but only over the house of Judah; the rest of the tribes might do as they pleased, but as for them and their house, they would be ruled by him whom God had chosen. See how David rose gradually; he was first anointed king in reversion, then, in possession, of one tribe only, and, at last, of all the tribes: thus the kingdom of the Son of David is set up by degrees; He is Lord of all, by divine designation, but we see not yet all things put under Him.

IV. His respectful message to the men of Jabesh-gilead, to thank them for their kindness to Saul. Still he studies to honor the memory of his predecessor, and thereby to show, that he was far from aiming at the crown from any principle of ambition, or enmity to Saul, but purely because called of God to it. Perhaps some thought he would have been displeased at them as over-officious. But he commended them for it, v. 5. He prays God to bless and recompense them for it. Due respect and affection showed to the bodies, names, and families, of those that are dead, in conscience toward God, is a piece of charity, which shall in nowise lose its reward. He promises to make them amends for it, I also will requite you. And finally, he prudently takes this opportunity to gain them to his interest, v. 7. Judah has anointed me king, and it will be your wisdom to concur with them, and in that to be valiant. We must not so dote on the dead, as to neglect or despise the blessings we have in those whom God has raised up to us in their stead.

V. 8—17. Here is, I. A rivalship between two kings; David, whom God made king, and Ish-bosheth, whom Abner made king. Such a spirit of contradiction is there, in the devices of men, to the counsels of God, that such a weak and silly thing as Ish-bosheth, who was not thought fit to go with his father to the battle, shall yet be thought fit to succeed him in the government, rather than David shall come peaceably to it. Herein David's kingdom was typical of the Messiah's, against which the heathens rage, and the rulers take counsel. 1. Since they must have a king like the nations, the crown must descend as with them from father to son. See how much mischief one man may be the occasion of. Ish-bosheth would never have set up himself, if Abner had not set him up, and made a tool of him to serve his own purposes. 2. Mahanaim was the place where he first made his claim. On the other side Jordan, where it was thought David had the least interest, and being at a distance from his forces, they might have time to strengthen themselves. But, having set up his standard there, the unthinking people of all the tribes of Israel, that is, the generality of them, submitted to him, (v. 9.) and Judah only was entire for David. This was a further trial of the faith of David in the promise of God, and of his patience, whether he could wait God's time for the performance of that promise. 3. Some difficulty there is about the time of the continuance of this competition. David reigned over Judah only, about 7 years; (v. 11.) and yet (v. 10.) Ish-bosheth reigned over Israel but 2 years: either before those 2 years, or after, or both, it was in general for the house of Saul, (ch. 3: 6.) and not any particular person of that house, that Abner declared. Or, these two years he reigned, before the war broke out, (v. 12.) which continued long, even the remaining 5 years, ch. 3: 1.

II. A rencounter between their two armies. It does not appear that either side brought their whole force into the field, for the slaughter was but small, v. 30, 31. We may wonder, 1. That the men of Judah did not appear and act more vigorously for David; but, it is likely, David would not suffer them, choosing rather to wait till God should give him the crown, without the effusion of Israelitish blood; for to him, as a type of Christ, that was very precious, Ps. 72. 14. Even those that were his adversaries he looked upon as his subjects, and would treat them accordingly. 2. That the men of Israel could sit down tamely under Ish-bosheth, for so many years, especially considering what characters many of the tribes displayed at this time, as we find, 1 Chron. 12: 23, &c. Wise men, mighty men, men of valor, expert in war, and not of double heart. But Divine Providence serves its own purposes, by the stupidity of men at some times, and the activity of the same persons at other times; they are unlike themselves, and yet the motions of Providence uniform.

(1.) Abner was the aggressor; and the seat of the war Gibeon; Abner chose it, because it was in the lot of Benjamin, where Saul had the most friends; yet, since he offered battle, Joab, David's general, would not decline it, but there joined issue with him, and met him by the pool of Gibeon, v. 13.

(2.) It should seem the trial between 12 and 12 of a side began in sport as a trial of skill, as gladiators: (v. 14.) perhaps, Saul had used his men to these barbarous pastimes, like a tyrant indeed, and Abner had learned it of him. He meant, 'Let them fight before us,' when he said, 'Let them play before us;' fools thus make a mock at sin. But he is unworthy the name of a man, that can be thus prodigal of human blood. Joab, having been bred up under David, had so much wisdom as not to make such a proposal, yet not resolution enough to refuse a challenge when another made it. Therefore he said, Let them arise; not that he was fond of the sport, or expected the duels would be decisive, but would not be hectored by his antagonist. How many precious lives have thus been sacrificed to the caprice of proud men! —But, however this sport began, it ended in blood; (v. 16.) they thrust every man his sword into his fellow's side, spurred on by honor, not by enmity; so they fell down together, that is, all the 24 were slain; such an equal match were they for one another, and so resolute, that neither side would either beg or give quarter; they did, as it were by agreement, (says Josephus,) despatch one another with mutual wounds. They that strike at other men's lives, often throw away their own, and death only conquers and rides in triumph. The wonderful obstinacy of both sides was remembered in the name given to the place, Helkath-hazzurim, the field of rocky men; men that were not only strong in body, but of firm and unshaken constancy, that stirred not at the sight of death

Verse 9.

The nation in general had rejected the judges, whom God had raised up for them, and had demanded a king: and, in the same rebellious spirit, they refused the prince whom the Lord had selected for them, who was a man of approved abilities and character; and preferred the surviving son of their rejected king, though in every respect an improper person. In this, David was a type of Christ, whom Israel would not submit to, though anointed by the Father to be their Prince and Savior. SCOTT.

Verses 10, 11.

For 2 years Ish-bosheth reigned in peace, and David made no attempts against him: but for the remainder of the 7 years and 6 months, there was war. Abner possessed the authority, and Ish-bosheth was only a nominal king. Ish-bosheth signifies a man of shame

12 ¶ And Abner the son of Ner, and the servants of Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, went out from Mahanaim to [t] Gibeon.

13 And [u] Joab the son of Zeruiah, and the servants of David, went out, and met * together by the [x] pool of Gibeon: and they sat down, the one on the one side of the pool, and the other on the other side of the pool.

14 And Abner said to Joab, Let the young men now arise, and [y] play before us. And Joab said, Let them arise.

15 Then there arose and went over by number twelve of Benjamin, which pertained to Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, and twelve of the servants of David.

16 And they caught every one his fellow by the head, and thrust his sword in his fellow's side; so they fell down together: wherefore that place was called † Helkath-hazzurim, which is in Gibeon.

17 And there was a very sore battle that day: and Abner was beaten, and the men of Israel, before the servants of David.

18 And there were [z] three sons of Zeruiah there, Joab, and Abishai, and Asahel: and Asahel [a] was as light of ‡ foot as a § wild roe.

19 And Asahel pursued after Abner; and in going he [b] turned not to the right hand nor to the left, from ‖ following Abner.

20 Then Abner looked behind him, and said, Art thou Asahel? And he answered, I am.

21 And Abner said to him, Turn thee aside to thy right hand or to thy left, and lay thee hold on one of the young men, and take thee his [¶] armor. But Asahel would not turn aside from following of him.

22 And Abner said again to Asahel, Turn thee aside from following me: [c] wherefore should I smite thee to the ground? [d] how then should I hold up my face to Joab thy brother?

23 Howbeit, he refused to turn aside: wherefore Abner, with the hinder end of the spear smote him under [e] the fifth rib, that the spear came out behind him; and he fell down there, and died in the same place: and it came to pass, that as many as came to the place where Asahel fell down and died, [f] stood still.

24 Joab also and Abishai pursued after Abner: and the sun went down when they were come to the hill of Ammah, that lieth before Giah, by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon.

25 And the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together after Abner, and became one troop, and stood on the top of an hill.

26 Then Abner called to Joab, and said, [g] Shall the [h] sword devour for ever? knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? [i] how long shall it be then, ere thou bid the people return from following their brethren?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. If we would possess temporal things with a blessing, we must not eagerly seize upon them, nor be determined by favorable events, or carnal counsellors: but we must observe the rules of God's Word, and pray for his direction; using those means, and those only, which He has appointed or allowed, and avoiding all evil, and 'appearance of evil,' in our pursuit of them: and then, whatever else we fail in, we shall certainly be directed in the way to the kingdom of heaven.—Ambition, jealousy, envy, and other evil passions, cause men to rebel against the word of God: but they generally attempt to conceal their real motives under plausible pretences. The believer's wisdom, however, consists in waiting quietly and silently under injuries, and in leaving God to plead his cause, except it is evidently his duty to be active. But there is a respect due to superior relations, to which equals or inferiors, in similiar circumstances, are not entitled. SCOTT.

He is also called Esh-baal. (1 Chr. 8 : 33. Note, Judg. 6:31,32.) He was evidently a very inconsiderable and despised person. [Yet Abner (see note, end of 1 Sam.) could employ the political jealousies of the tribes in favor of one even so worthless.] SCOTT.

Verses 12, 13.

The moderation with which Joab conducted the war may be ascribed to the instructions given him by David. 'For he had sworn to Saul, that he would not cut off his seed, and therefore would not willingly engage against Ish-bosheth.' Patrick. ID.

Verses 14—16.

It is probable Joab kept on the defensive, and gave Abner no opportunity of attacking him; and that Abner's impatience to engage induced him to give this rash challenge. Some think that only the twelve Benjamites were slain: but the words more obviously mean, that all the company were butchered. SCOTT.

Verses 18—23.

The circumstances, stated in these vs. show, that Abner was not at all to blame in the death of Asahel: for he was constrained to slay him in his own defence. ID.

up every one from following his brother.

28 So Joab blew a trumpet, and all the people stood still, and pursued after Israel no more, neither fought they any more.

29 And Abner and his men walked all that night through the plain, and passed over Jordan, and went through all [m] Bithron, and they came to Mahanaim.

30 And Joab returned from following Abner: and when he had gathered all the people together, there lacked of David's servants nineteen men and Asahel.

31 But the servants of David had smitten of Benjamin, and of Abner's men, so that [n] three hundred and threescore men died.

32 And they took up Asahel, and [o] buried him in the sepulchre of his father which was in Beth-lehem. And Joab and his men [p] went all night, and they came to Hebron at break of day.

CHAP. III.

David grows stronger, and Ish-bosheth weaker, during the war, 1. Six sons are born to David in Hebron, 2—5. Abner quarrels with Ish-bosheth, and offers his services to David, 6—12. David demands and receives back Michal, 13—16. Abner communes with the Israelites, goes to David, and is feasted by him, and sent away in peace, 17—21. Joab is angry with David, and murders Abner, 22—27. David protests against his wickedness, and denounces a curse upon him, 28—30. David mourns for Abner, 31—39.

NOW there was [a] long war [b] between the house of Saul and the house of David: but [c] David waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker.

2 And unto David were [d] sons born in Hebron: and his first born was [e] Amnon, of [f] Ahinoam the Jezreelitess;

3 And his second, [g] Chileab, [h] of Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite; and the third, [i] Absalom the son of Maacah, the daughter of [j] Talmai king of [k] Geshur;

4 And the fourth [l] Adonijah the son of Haggith; and the fifth, Shephatiah the son of Abital;

5 And the sixth, Ithream, by Eglah David's wife. These were born to David in Hebron.

6 ¶ And it came to pass, while there was war between the house of Saul and the house of David, that [m] Abner made himself strong for the house of Saul.

CHAP. III. The battle between Joab and Abner did not end the controversy between the two houses of Saul, and David, but it is in this ch. working towards a period.

V. 1—6. Here is, 1. David's struggle with the house of Saul, before his settlement in the throne was completed, v. 1. It is not strange there was war between them; but one would wonder it should be a long war: however, though truth and equity will triumph at last, God may, for wise and holy ends, prolong the conflict. The length of this war tried the faith and patience of David, and made his establishment at last the more welcome to him. The house of Saul lost places, lost men, sunk in its reputation, grew less considerable, and was foiled in every engagement; but the house of David grew stronger and stronger; many prudently came into his interests, being convinced that he would certainly win the day. So the contest between grace and corruption, in the hearts of believers, is long; but as the work of sanctification is carried on, corruption grows weaker and weaker; while grace grows stronger and stronger, till it comes to a perfect man, and judgment is brought forth unto victory.

2. The increase of his own house, v. 2—5. As the death of Saul's sons weakened his interest, so the birth of David's strengthened his. But it was David's fault thus to multiply wives, contrary to the law, (Deut. 17: 17.) and a bad example to his successors. We read not that any of these sons came to be famous; three of them were infamous, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah; we have therefore reason to rejoice with trembling in the building up of our families. His son by Abigail is called Chileab, v. 3. but 1 Chron. 3: 1. Daniel. Chileab, signifies; like his father; or, the father's picture. Absalom's mother is said to be the daughter of a heathen prince: perhaps David thereby hoped to strengthen his interest, but the issue of the marriage was one that proved his grief and shame. The last is called David's wife, which, therefore, some think, was Michal, his first and most rightful wife, called here by another name; and though she had no child after she mocked David, she might have had before.

Thus was David's house strengthened; but it was Abner that made himself strong for the house

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12—32. From age to age numbers are ambitious of venturing their lives and souls, for the empty hope of being celebrated as valiant men, after they are dead! and from the same motive they mingle the blood of their brethren with their own; though they bear them no resentment, and have received no provocation from them! But what can be more senseless and infatuated than such a conduct?—The sword of civil war, when once unsheathed, is not easily returned into the scabbard; and those who, in their eagerness to engage, make light of such unnatural contests, will perceive in the event that they are bitterness to all concerned.—It is always right to exercise clemency to the vanquished, and generosity to the wretched; to spare the shedding of human blood; to alleviate, in every way we possibly can, the sum of human misery; and to strive for peace, especially in the intestine contentions of nations or churches, where the common cause must suffer, which party soever may acquire the ascendency. —Different endowments qualify us for varied kinds of service, and should be improved for that purpose. But when talents are over-rated; and when men confide and glory in them, they will go beyond the dictates of prudence, as well as out of the line of duty, in order to distinguish themselves; they will despise warning and counsel, as the effect of envy and cowardice; and they will always be shamed, and frequently ruined, by those qualifications in which they prided themselves. Often do men fancy themselves about to seize upon happiness, when death stops their career, and lays them in the dust: and if they will rush forwards in the road to destruction, though plainly warned of their danger, they can blame none but themselves. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. The civil war, between David and Ish-bosheth, continued about five years and a half: but it seems to have been conducted with great moderation on the part of David. SCOTT.

Verses 2—5.

(M. R.) David's motives for multiplying wives must have been carnal, in one way or other; and his conduct in this respect proved the occasion of much sin and trouble, in the subsequent part of his life. He had by all his wives no more than six sons, during the seven years that he reigned at Hebron; though probably he had some daughters, who are not mentioned.—Perhaps Maacah, the daughter of Talmai, had been taken prisoner, and proselyted before David married her: though some think David had contracted affinity with the king of Geshur, to strengthen himself against Ish-bosheth.—It is not known, why Eglah only is called 'David's wife.' SCOTT.

Verses 6—10.

(M. R.) No doubt Abner was guilty of the crime charged upon him, which was considered as a claim to the kingdom of a deceased

7 And Saul had a concubine, whose name was [n]Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah: and Ish-bosheth said to Abner, Wherefore hast thou [o]gone in unto my father's concubine?

8 Then was Abner [p]very wroth for the words of Ish-bosheth, and said, Am [q]I a dog's head, which against Judah [r]do show kindness this day unto the house of Saul thy father, to his brethren, and to his friends, and have not delivered thee into the hand of David, that thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman?

9 [s]So do God to Abner, and more also, except [t]as the LORD hath sworn to David, even so I do to him;

10 To translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and to set up the throne of David over Israel, and over Judah, [u]from Dan even to Beer-sheba.

11 And he could not answer Abner a word again, [x]because he feared him.

12 ¶ And Abner sent messengers to David on his behalf, saying, [y]Whose is the land? saying also, [z]Make thy league with me, and behold, [a]my hand shall be with thee, to bring about all Israel unto thee.

13 And he said, Well; I will make a league with thee: but one thing I require of thee, * that is, [b]Thou shalt not see my face, except thou first bring [c]Michal Saul's daughter, when thou comest to see my face.

14 And David sent messengers to Ish-bosheth Saul's son, saying, Deliver me my wife Michal, which I espoused to me for a hundred foreskins of the Philistines.

15 And Ish-bosheth sent, and took her from her husband, even from [d]Phaltiel the son of Laish.

16 And her husband went with her † along weeping behind her to [e]Bahurim. Then said Abner unto him, Go, return. And he returned.

[Practical Observations.]

of Saul, which is mentioned, (v. 6.) to show that if he failed them, they would fall of course.

V. 7—21. Here, I. Abner breaks with Ish-bosheth, on a little provocation Ish-bosheth unadvisedly gave him. God can serve his own purposes by the sins and follies of men. Note, Proud men will not bear to be reproved, especially by those whom they think they have obliged. With the utmost arrogance and insolence, Abner lets him know, that, as he had raised him up, so he could pull him down again, and would do it. He knew God had sworn to give David the kingdom, and yet he had opposed it with all his might, from a principle of ambition; but now he complies with it from a principle of revenge, under color of some regard to the will of God, which was but a pretence. Slaves to their lusts have many masters, which drive, some one way, and some another.

II. Abner treats with David. We must suppose he began to grow weary of Ish-bosheth's cause, and sought an opportunity to desert it; else, however he might threaten Ish-bosheth with it, to quash the charge against himself, he would not have made good his angry words so soon as he did, v. 12. Note, God can find ways to make those serviceable to the kingdom of Christ, who yet have no sincere affection for it, and who have vigorously set themselves against it. Enemies are sometimes made a footstool, not only to be trodden upon, but to ascend by. The earth helped the woman.

III. David enters into a treaty with Abner, on condition he procure him the restitution of Michal his wife, v. 13. in which he showed the sincerity of his conjugal affection to his first and most rightful wife, and testified his respect to the house of Saul; he valued himself not a little on his relation to it. He cannot be pleased with the honors of the throne, unless he have Michal, Saul's daughter, to share them with him; so far was he from bearing any malice to the family of his enemy. Her latter husband was loath to part with her, (v. 16.) usurpers must expect to resign. Let no man therefore set his heart on what he is not entitled to. If any disagreement has separated husband and wife, as they expect the blessing of God, let them be reconciled, and come together again; let all former quarrels be forgotten, and let them live together in love, according to [their own solemn promise, and] God's holy ordinance.

IV. Abner uses his interest with the elders of Israel, to bring them over to David; knowing, that, which ever way they went, the common people would follow of course. Now that it serves his own turn, he can plead in David's behalf, that he was, 1. Israel's choice, (v. 17.) and 2. God's choice, v. 18. Compare v. 9. 'When God appointed Samuel to anoint him, He did, in effect, promise, that by his hand he would save Israel; for, for that end he was made king. Who would have expected such reasonings out of Abner's mouth? But thus God will make the enemies of his people to know, and own, that He has loved them, Rev. 3: 9. He particularly applied himself to Benjamin, his own tribe, on whom he had the greatest influence, and whom he had drawn to the house of Saul; he that deceived them, was concerned to undeceive them. Thus the multitude are as they are managed.

V. David concludes the treaty with Abner, who reports the sense of the people, and the success of his communications with them, v. 19. He came now, not, as at first, privately, but with a retinue of 20 men, and David entertained them with a feast, (v. 20.) in token of reconciliation and joy, and as a pledge of the agreement between them: it was a feast upon a covenant, like that, Gen. 26: 30. If thine enemy hunger, feed him; but if he submit, feast him. Abner, pleased with his entertainment, with the prevention of his fall with Saul's house, and much more with his prospects

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. The power and policy of Satan, and of wicked men, may struggle against the purposes of God, and the cause of his anointed King, and occasion apparent delays: but his interest is gaining ground, though by unnoticed degrees, and his glory will ere long be displayed throughout the earth.—Inconstancy must be incident to selfish men: and sometimes making pretensions to religion seems the readiest way to the gratification of worldly ambition, rapacity, or revenge.—Many are not above committing very base crimes, who are too proud to bear reproof, or even the suspicion of being guilty: and while men go on in their sins apparently without concern, they are often conscious that they are fighting against God!—Little confidence can be placed in those who affront their Maker, betray their country, or deceive those who confide in them, under the pretence of serving their friends: most certainly they mean to serve their own purposes; and will betray those also who now trust them, when they can obtain advantageous terms for doing it. Yet even by such as act from revenge, ambition, lust, or avarice, the Lord secretly carries on his own designs: but as they intend not to honor Him, whatever they profess; so when his ends are answered, He will throw them aside with contempt.—Though guilt commonly renders men objects of our deepest compassion; yet no affection can be either truly amiable or allowable, which is not regulated according to the Word of God. SCOTT.

prince. (Notes, 1 Kings 2:15—25.) Ish-bosheth however was very imprudent to mention it, as he was entirely dependent on Abner. Ambition, and not regard to Ish-bosheth, had hitherto induced him to support his interest: and revenge and policy, not regard to the will of God, at length prevailed with him at this time to join David's party. 'Such is the genius of many great courtiers, who are irritated on slight occasions; and rather rule over kings, than are ruled by them.' Pellicanus. SCOTT.

Dog's head. (8) (M. R.) A proverbial expression for what was deemed worthless and contemptible.—Some explain it to mean, 'As if I were only fit to be set over a company of dogs.' ID.

Verse 12.

Whose is the land?] Abner by this expression seems to have insinuated, that he, not Ish-bosheth, retained the authority: if therefore David would grant him advantageous terms, he would put him in possession of the whole land.—Some however interpret the words, as an acknowledgment of David's title, by the appointment of God, to the kingdom over all Israel. SCOTT.

Verses 13—16.

David knew the kingdom was his, in the purpose of God; it was desirable to sheath the sword of civil war, and to unite all Israel voluntarily under one king; he was not accountable for Abner's secret motives; and doubtless he meant to grant Ish-bosheth very favorable terms, had not his purposes been prevented.—If David had divorced Michal, and she had in consequence been married to another, he must not have received her again: but the separation was violent on both sides. (M. R.) It is probable her marriage to Phaltiel was a force on her inclinations. and Phaltiel was very criminal in taking another man's wife, whatever affection he had for her.—David required Michal to be restored, perhaps out of affection for her; or to strengthen his interest by asserting his affinity with the house of Saul, or to show his regard for the law of God, and to rebuke a man who openly violat

17 And Abner had communication with the elders of Israel, saying, Ye sought for David in times past to be king over you:

18 Now then do it: [f]for the LORD hath spoken of David, saying, [g]By the hand of my servant David I will save my people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies.

19 And Abner also spake in the ears of [h]Benjamin: and Abner went also to speak in the ears of David in Hebron, all that seemed good to Israel, and that seemed good to the whole house of Benjamin.

20 So Abner came to David to Hebron, and twenty men with him. And [i]David made Abner, and the men that were with him, a feast.

21 And Abner said unto David, I will arise and go, and [j]will gather all Israel unto my lord the king, that they may make a league with thee, and that thou mayest [k]reign over all that thine heart desireth. And David sent Abner away; and he went in peace.

22 ¶ And, behold, the servants of David and Joab came from pursuing a troop, and brought in a great spoil with them: but Abner was not with David in Hebron; for he had sent him away, and he was gone in peace.

23 When Joab and all the host that was with him were come, they told Joab, saying, Abner the son of Ner came to the king, and he hath sent him away, and he is gone in peace.

24 Then Joab came to the king, and said, [l]What hast thou done? behold, Abner came unto thee: why is it that thou hast sent him away, and he is quite gone?

25 Thou knowest Abner the son of Ner, [m]that he came to deceive thee, [n]and to know thy going out, and thy coming in, and to know all that thou doest.

26 And when Joab was come out from David, [o]he sent messengers after Abner, which brought him again from the well of Sirah: but David knew it not.

27 And when Abner was returned to Hebron, Joab [p]took him aside in the gate to speak with him † quietly, and smote him there [q]under the fifth rib, that he died, [r]for the blood of Asahel his brother.

28 ¶ And afterward when David heard it, he said, I and my kingdom are [s]guiltless before the LORD for ever, from the ‡ blood of Abner the son of Ner.

of preferment under David, undertakes, in a little time, to perfect the revolution, v. 21. However, the affair between them was well settled. Thus it behooves all, who fear God and keep his commandments, to avoid strife, even with the wicked; to live at peace with all men, and to show the world that they are children of the light.

V. 22—39. We have here an account of the murder of Abner by Joab, and David's deep resentment of it.

I. Joab very insolently fell foul upon David for treating with Abner, and called him a fool, in effect. He had all the reason in the world to be satisfied of David's prudence, and to acquiesce in the measures he took, knowing him to be a wise and good man himself, and under a divine conduct in all his affairs; yet, as if he had the same sway in David's cause that Abner had in Ish-bosheth's, he chides David, and reproaches him to his face, as impolitic, v. 24, 25. As if David were accountable to him for what he did. I know not whether to wonder more, that Joab had impudence enough to give such an affront to his prince, or David patience enough to take it. We find no answer that David gave him, not because he feared him, as Ish-bosheth did Abner, (v. 11.) but because he despised him, or because Joab had not so much good manners as to stay for an answer.

II. He very treacherously sent for Abner back, and, under color of a private conference with him, barbarously killed him with his own hand. That he made use of David's name, under pretence of giving him some further instructions, is intimated in that, but David knew it not, v. 26. and it is intimated, (v. 30.) that Abishai was privy to the design, aiding and abetting, and would have come in to his brother's assistance, had there been occasion: he is therefore charged as an accessary; Joab and Abishai slew Abner; though perhaps He only knew it, who is privy to the thoughts and intents of men's hearts.

Now in this, 1. It is certain the Lord was righteous. Abner had maliciously, and against the convictions of his conscience, opposed David; he had basely deserted Ish-bosheth, and betrayed him, under pretence of regard to God and Israel, but really out of pride and revenge, and impatience of control; God will not therefore use so bad a man, though David might, in so good a work, as the uniting of Israel. But, 2. It is as certain Joab was unrighteous. (1.) Even the pretence for doing it was very unjust. Joab and Abishai pretended to be the avengers of blood; (v. 27, 30.) but Abner slew Asahel in an open war, wherein Abner indeed had given the challenge, but Joab himself had accepted it, and had slain many of Abner's friends; he did it likewise in his own defence, and not till he had given him fair warning, and with reluctancy; but Joab here shed the blood of war in peace, 1 Kings 2: 6. (2.) What we have reason to think was at the bottom of Joab's enmity to Abner, made it much worse. Joab was now general of David's forces; but if Abner should come into his interest, he would possibly be preferred before him, being a senior officer, and more experienced in the art of war. (3.) He did it treacherously, and under pretence of speaking peaceably to him, Deut. 27: 24. Thus he basely slew Amasa, ch. 20: 9, 10. (4.) It was a great affront and injury to David. Abner was now actually in David's service, and Joab knew it, so that, through his side, he struck at David himself. (5.) It was a great aggravation of the murder, that he did it in the gate, openly and avowedly, as one that was not ashamed, nor could blush. The gate was the place of judgment and the place of concourse; so that he did it in defiance of justice, both the just sentence of the magistrates, and the just resentments of the crowd; as one that neither feared God, nor regarded man, but thought himself above all control: and Hebron was a Levites' city, and a city of refuge.

III. David laid it deeply to heart, and many ways expressed his detestation of this execrable villany.

1. Lest any should suspect Joab had some secret intimation from David to do as he did, he here solemnly appeals to God concerning his innocency, v. 28. It is a comfort to be able to say, when any bad thing is done, that we had no hand in it.

2. He entailed the curse for it on Joab and his family, v. 29. 'Let the iniquity be visited on his children, and children's children, in some hereditary disease or other.' This intimates that the guilt of blood brings a curse on families; if men do not avenge it, God will, and will lay up the iniquity for the children. But, methinks, a resolute punishment of the murderer himself would better have become David, than this passionate imprecation of God's judgments on his posterity

3. He called on all about him, even Joab himself, to lament the death of Abner, v. 31. His alliance to Saul, his place as general, his interest, and the great services he had formerly done, were enough to denominate him a prince and a great man. When he could not call him a saint and a ed it.—As Abner did not deem it politic, at that juncture, directly to take Michal from Phaltiel, David addressed himself to Ish-bosheth, whose sister she was, who complied with his demand; perhaps being willing to be on amicable terms with him, as he could not overcome him by arms. SCOTT.

Verses 17—21.

It seems, that the people in general had desired to receive David as their king, especially when Saul and his sons were slain; but that Abner's great authority had induced them to set up Ish-bosheth: so that now, when Abner entered into the interests of David, he had little difficulty in bringing them over to him. The words which Abner mentions, as spoken by the LORD concerning David, are not found in the preceding history; but the meaning of them is implied in the promises given him. (M. R. f, g.) SCOTT.

30 So Joab and Abishai his brother [y]slew Abner, [z]because he had slain their brother Asahel at Gibeon in the battle.

31 And David said to Joab, and to all the people that were with him, [a]Rend your clothes, and gird you with sackcloth, and mourn before Abner. And king David himself followed the † bier.

32 And they buried Abner in Hebron; and the king [b]lifted up his voice, and wept at the grave of Abner; and all the people wept.

33 And the king lamented over Abner, and said, Died Abner [c]as a fool dieth?

34 Thy [d]hands were not bound, nor thy feet put into fetters: as a man falleth before ‡ wicked men, so fellest thou. And all the people [e]wept again over him.

35 And when all the people came to [f]cause David to eat meat while it was yet day, David sware, saying, [g]So do God to me and more also, if I taste bread, or ought else, [h]till the sun be down.

36 And all the people took notice of it, and it § pleased them: [i]as whatsoever the king did pleased all the people.

37 For all the people, and all Israel, understood that day, that it was not of the king to slay Abner the son of Ner.

38 And the king said unto his servants, Know ye not that there is [k]a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?

39 And [l]I am this day ‖ weak though anointed

4. David himself followed the corpse as chief mourner, and made a funeral oration at the grave; v. 31, 32. All former quarrels are forgotten, and David is the true mourner for Abner's fall. What he said over the grave, fetched fresh floods of tears from the eyes of all present, when they thought they had already paid the debt in full, v. 33, 34. (1.) He speaks as one vexed that so great a man as Abner, one so famed for conduct and courage, should be imposed upon by a color of friendship, slain by surprise, and so, die as a fool dies. The wisest and stoutest of men have no fence against treachery. See here how much more we are beholden to God's providence, than to our own prudence, for the continuance of our lives and comforts. Were it not for the hold God has of the consciences of bad men, how soon would the weak and innocent become an easy prey to the strong and merciless, and the wisest die as fools! Or, (2.) He speaks as one maintaining that Abner did not fool himself out of his life. 'Died Abner as a fool dies? No, he did not, not as a criminal, a traitor or felon; Abner falls not before just men, by a judicial sentence, but as a man, an innocent man, before wicked men, thieves, and robbers.' Died Abner as Nabal died? So the Seventy read it; but Abner's fate was such as might have been the fate of the best man in the world. Abner did not throw away his life as Asahel did. Note, It is a sad thing to die like a fool, as they do, that any way shorten their own days, and much more they that make no provision for another world.

5. He fasted all that day, and would by no means be persuaded to eat any thing till night, v. 35. It was then the custom of great mourners to refrain for the time from bodily refreshments, as ch. 1: 12. 1 Sam. 31: 13. How incongruous is it then to turn the house of mourning into a house of feasting! David's respect to Abner was very pleasing to the people, and satisfied them he was not, in the least, accessory to the murder; (v. 36, 37.) he was solicitous to avoid the suspicion, lest Joab's villany should have made him odious, as that of Simeon and Levi did Jacob. On this occasion it is said, Whatever the king did, pleased all the people. Which bespeaks, his good affection to them, and their good opinion of him; such a mutual willingness to please, and easiness to be pleased, will make every relation comfortable.

6. He bewailed it that he could not, with safety, do justice on the murderers, v. 39. but these sons of Zeruiah were too hard for him, too big for the law to lay hold of; therefore, though by man, by the magistrate, the blood of a murderer should be shed, (Gen. 9: 6.) David bears the sword in vain; he ought to have done his duty, and trusted God with the issue, but he contents himself, as a private person, to leave them to the judgment of God; The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness. This was a diminution of his greatness and of his goodness. Who would be fond of power, when a man may have the name of it, and must be accountable for it, and yet be guilt, and to remove it from the land; being perhaps afraid of a revolt of the soldiers, if he proceeded to execute vengeance on the murderer. But he should have remembered, that He, 'who stilleth the raging of the sea,' is able also 'to still the madness of the people.' In so just a cause, he ought to have risked all consequences. He was anointed king to administer justice without respect of persons; and he might have been assured of the Lord's support in doing so important a duty: the example would have been very salutary; all impartial persons would have applauded his firmness; perhaps Ish-bosheth's murder would have been prevented, as well as many other crimes and calamities, in the latter part of his reign. But his fear of man in this instance overcame his faith in God, and Joab continued and increased in authority, and in crimes, to the end of David's life: he was at length, however, called to account for them all. BECAUSE he had slain their brother.] This law of revenge, in all its blood-thirstiness, still exists among the Arabs, and other half-civilized, as well as most savage nations; nor is it banished from the code of many an unrenewed heart in Christian lands. Few, indeed very few comparatively, acknowledge the principles of Christ herein, in all their length and breadth; or, if the majority of the best communities do acknowledge them for individuals, they yet contend that the law of revenge is proper for nations. 'But,' says the acute Dr. Wayland, 'revenge is that disposition which prompts us to inflict pain upon another, for the sake of alleviating the painful feeling of personal degradation, consequent upon an injury. Now suppose a man, inflamed and excited by this feeling of injury, should inflict, upon the other party, pain, until his excited feeling was gratified: the injured party would then manifestly become the injurer, and thus, the original injurer would be, by the same rule, entitled to retaliate. Thus, revenge and retaliation would go on increasing until the death of one of the parties. The duty of vengeance would then devolve upon the surviving friends and relatives of the deceased, and the circle would widen, until it involved whole tribes or nations. Thus, the indulgence of this one evil passion would, in a few generations, render the thronged city an unpeopled solitude: . . . . witness the North American Indians.' Elements of Moral Science. ED.

CHAP. IV. When Abner was slain, David was at a loss for a friend to perfect the reduction of those tribes that were yet in Ish-bosheth's interest; but here Providence brings it about by the removal of Ish-bosheth.

V. 1—8. I. Saul's house still grew weaker and weaker. Ish-bosheth had no spirit left in him; all that adhered to him were troubled, and at a loss what to do, whether to proceed in their treaty with David or no, v. 1. As for Mephibosheth, who, in the right of his father Jonathan, had a prior title, he was lame, and unfit for any service, v. 4. See what sad accidents children are liable to in their infancy. What reason have we to be thankful to God for the preservation of our limbs and senses to us, through the many perils of the weak and helpless state of infancy, and to own his goodness! Ps. 91: 12.

II. The murder of Saul's son, by Baanah and Rechab, v. 2, 3. They were, or had been, Ish-bosheth's own servants; so much the more base and treacherous was it in them to do him a mischief. They were of his own tribe, and of the city of Beeroth; Gittaim lay not far off in the same tribe, but was better fortified by nature, being situate (if we may depend on Fuller's map) between the two rocks, Bozez and Seneh; there the Beerothites probably took root, and never returned to Beeroth again, which made Beeroth, that had been one of the cities of the Gibeonites, (Josh. 9: 17.) to be forgotten, and Gittaim to be famous long after, as we find, Neh. 11: 33.

1. How the murder was committed, v. 5—7. It does not appear that the country was at any time of the year so hot, as to oblige the inhabitants to retire at noon, as they do in Spain, and other countries, in the heat of summer; but Ish-bosheth was a sluggish man, loved his ease, and hated business: and when he should have been, at this critical juncture, at the head of his forces in the field, or at the head of his counsels in a treaty with David, he was lying upon his bed, and sleeping, for his hands were feeble, (v. 1.) and so were his head and heart. Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty and ruin. The idle soul is an easy prey to the destroyer. Baanah and Rechab came into the house, under pretence of fetching wheat to victual their regiments; and such was the plainness of those times, that the king's corn-chamber, and his bed-chamber, lay near together, which gave the traitors an opportunity, when fetching wheat, to murder him as he lay on the bed.

2. The murderers triumphed in what they had done, and make a present of Ish-bosheth's head to David; (v. 8.) than which they thought nothing could be more acceptable to him: yea, and they make themselves instruments of God's justice, though they had no commission. Not that they had any regard either to God, or David's honor; they aimed at nothing but to make their own fortunes, (as we say,) and to get preferment in David's court; but, to ingratiate themselves with

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17—39. The bulk of mankind, in all ages, are guided by those who rule or teach them, and address their passions by eloquence or flattery: but let us seek a sound judgment, a good conscience, and an upright heart; that we may know and adhere to the truth and will of God, amidst all changes.—In cultivating Christian tempers, and performing relative duties, extremes and counterfeits must be guarded against: as, through undue ascendency of those inferiors, who ought 'to be kept in subjection with all gravity,' shameful things will often be done or connived at, to the disgrace of individuals, and the reproach of the common cause. Every one therefore should know his own place and duties, and exercise the Christian temper in doing them; and not make the fear of being ruffled or discomposed an excuse for neglecting them.—It is not enough for those, who are invested with authority, to express their abhorrence of crimes and criminals, or their compassion for those who suffer by them: but all partialities, relative affections, and interested considerations should be laid aside, and condign punishment inflicted; that 'others may hear, and fear, and do no more such wickedness:' and in every state, the executive authority should possess power sufficient to punish the proudest subject, lest blood be imputed to the land.—Alas, what are the imagined advantages of royalty? The king 'after God's own heart' finds as much cause for lamentation and complaint, as when a poor fugitive! But He, who now reigns upon the throne of David, has a kingdom of a nobler kind: whatever He does is noticed by and pleases all his willing people: and He will bring them all to share his glory and joy. Many however are outwardly serviceable to his cause, who only seek themselves in all they do, and from time to time disgrace it with their crimes: these may escape for a season, but at length they shall be numbered with his enemies, and perish for ever. thus acquired among his soldiers and friends, and even with him; combined to render it extremely difficult, and even perilous, to oppose and punish them. But the satisfaction, which the people expressed in the former part of his conduct, showed, that he might, notwithstanding, very safely have proceeded to execute the divine law on the offenders, in its utmost strictness. NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. Perhaps Ish-bosheth had not before been certainly informed, of Abner's desertion to David: or, both he and the people hoped by Abner's means to have obtained better terms. But by his death their affairs were left in a most unsettled and dangerous situation; and they had no person in whom they could place confidence, either to lead them to battle, or negotiate a treaty. Verses 2—4.

When Saul's army was routed, and he and his sons slain, the inhabitants of Beeroth deserted their city, and went to sojourn at Gittaim; where they remained, when this history was written. (Neh. 11:33. 1 Sam. 31:7.)—These facts seem to have been recorded, to illustrate the consternation which followed the death of Saul and his sons. SCOTT.

Verse 5.

It was, and is still, a custom in the east countries, to retire for sleep about noon; i. e. for such as live in ease and luxury; not for others, except in very sultry regions. The Scripture gives no intimation that this was a common practice in Israel. (M. R. j.) ID.

12 And David commanded his young men, and they [t] slew them, and cut off their hands and their feet, and [u] hanged them up over the pool in Hebron. But they took the head of Ish-bosheth, and buried it [x] in the sepulchre of Abner in Hebron.

CHAP. V.

The elders of the tribes, at Hebron, anoint David king over all Israel, 1—3. His age at the beginning of his reign, and the length of his reign, 4, 5. He takes Zion from the Jebusites, and calls it the city of David, 6—10. Hiram sends him timber and workmen to build him a house, 11. He prospers, and takes more wives; and eleven sons are born to him, 12—16. By divine direction, he gains two victories over the Philistines, 17—25.

THEN [a] came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron, and spake, saying, Behold, [b] we are thy bone and thy flesh.

him, they pretend a concern for his life, a conviction of his title, and a zealous desire to see him in full possession of the throne.

V. 9—12. We have here justice done on the murderers of Ish-bosheth.

I. Sentence passed on them. There needed no evidence; David therefore shows them the heinousness of the crime, and that blood called for blood from his hand, who was now the chief magistrate, and was, by office, the avenger of blood. And, perhaps, he was the more vigorous in the prosecution, because, for reasons of state, he had spared Joab. Observe, 1. How he aggravates the crime, v. 11. Ish-bosheth was a righteous person: he had done them no wrong, nor designed them any; and David was satisfied, that his opposition to him was not from malice, but mistake, from an idea he had of his own title to the crown, and the influence of others on him, who urged him to put in for it. Note, Charity teaches us to make the best, not only of our friends, but of our enemies, and to think those may be righteous persons, who yet, in some instances, do us wrong. The manner of it much aggravated the crime. Assassinating is confessedly the most odious and villanous way of murdering. Cursed is he that smiteth his neighbor secretly. 2. He quotes a precedent; v. 10. Nothing is here said of the Amalekite's helping Saul to kill himself, only of his bringing the tidings of it: by which it should seem the story he told, was, on inquiry, found to be false, and that he lied against his own head. 3. He ratifies the sentence with an oath, v. 9. He expresses himself thus resolutely, to prevent the making of any intercession for the criminals by those about him: and thus piously, to intimate that his dependence was upon God for the putting of him in possession of the promised throne, and that he would not be beholden to any man to help him to it, by any indirect or unlawful practices. He speaks of his redemption from all adversity, as a thing done, though he had many a storm yet before him, because he knew that He who had delivered, would deliver. Hereupon, he signs a warrant for the execution of these men, v. 12. This may seem severe, when they intended him a kindness in what they did; but he would thus show his detestation of the villany, and his resentment of the great affront they put upon him, in expecting that he should patronise and reward it; they could scarcely have done him a greater injury, than thus to think him altogether such a one as themselves; one that cared not what blood he waded through to the crown.

II. Execution done. The murderers were put to death according to law, and their hands and feet hung up; not their whole bodies, the law forbade that, but only their hands and feet, [in this place of concourse,]—to frighten others, to be monuments of David's justice, and recommend him to the esteem of the people, as a man fit to rule, and that aimed not at his own preferment, nor had any enmity to the house of Saul, but only, and sincerely, designed the public welfare. But what a confusion to the two murderers! What a horrid disappointment! And such they will meet with, who think to serve the interests of the Son of David, by any immoral practices, by war and persecution, fraud and rapine; who, under color of religion, murder princes, break solemn contracts, lay countries waste, hate their brethren, and cast them out, and say, Let the Lord be glorified; kill them, and think they do God good service. However men may canonize such methods of serving the church and the catholic cause, Christ will let them know, another day, that Christianity was not intended to destroy humanity; and they, who thus think to merit heaven, shall not escape the damnation of hell.

CHAP. V. How far Abner's deserting the house of Saul, his murder, and the murder of Ish-bosheth, might contribute to perfect the revolution, and establish David king over all Israel, does not appear; but, it should seem, that happy change followed presently thereupon, which in this ch. we have an account of.

V. 1—5. Here is, I. The humble address of all the tribes to David, beseeching him to take the government, and owning him for their king.

2 Also in time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that [c] leddest out and broughtest in Israel: and the LORD said to thee, [d] Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be [e] a captain over Israel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every thing will concur in forwarding the accomplishment of God's word, whether of promise or of wrath, when the appointed time approaches: on one hand there can be no failure; on the other, no escape.—Wretched indeed are they, who are engaged in undertakings, in which none can serve them without opposing the known will of God! The more exalted their station, the greater is their danger: for the very men, in whom they repose their chief confidence, are destitute of principle, serve them only for gain, and will betray or murder them when their mercenary schemes require it.—Alas! what numbers sink, from self-indulgence and carnal security, into unsuspected and inevitable destruction!—Many are conscious, that they should be pleased with villany, provided it conduced greatly to their profit: thus they are led confidently to conclude, that others will be so too; and as numbers are rewarded for villanous actions, they expect the same. Persons in authority should therefore decidedly manifest, that they will not be served by such base characters, but will, instead of rewarding, severely punish their crimes.—Finally, the Son of David will requite those, who pretend to serve his cause by frauds, treasons, massacres, and persecutions, with far more dreadful vengeance, than was inflicted by David on Ish-bosheth's murderers.

Redeemed, &c. (9) (M. R.—Note, Gen. 48:16.) By using this language, David reminded all who heard him, that in his most extreme dangers, he had neither used treachery or cruelty himself, nor allowed his men to use them. It must therefore be evident, that, now the Lord had rescued and prospered him, he had no temptation to countenance such traitors as Rechab and Baanah. SCOTT.

What number came from each tribe, with what zeal and sincerity they came, and how they were entertained for three days at Hebron, when they were all of one heart to make David king, we have a full account, 1 Chron. 12: 23—40. Here we have only the heads of their address, containing their grounds for making David king. 1. Their relation to him, v. 1. 'We know thou hast a tender concern for us, as a man has for his own body, which Saul and his house had not; therefore thou wilt be as glad as we shall be, to put an end to this long civil war; and thou wilt pity us, protect us, and do thine utmost for our welfare.' 2. His former services to the public were a further inducement; v. 2. He that is faithful in a little deserves to be intrusted with more. 3. The divine appointment was the greatest inducement of all. The Lord said, Thou shalt feed my people Israel; i. e. thou shalt rule them; for princes are to feed their people as shepherds, in every thing consulting the subjects' benefit; feeding them, and not fleecing them. Since God has said so, now at length, when need drives them to it, they are persuaded to say so too.

II. The public and solemn inauguration of David, v. 3. A convention of the states was called, all the elders of Israel came to him; the contract was settled; he obliged himself to protect them as their judge in peace, and captain in war; and they obliged themselves to obey him; God was a Witness. Hereupon he was, the third time, anointed king. His advances were gradual, that his faith might be tried, and that he might gain experience. Thus his kingdom typified that of the Messiah, which was to come to its height by degrees, Heb. 2: 8. 1 Cor. 15: 25.

III. A general account of his reign and age, 30 years. v. 4, 5. At that age, the Levites were at first appointed to begin their ministration. Num. 4: 3. About that age, the Son of David entered on his public ministry, Luke 3: 23. Then men come to their full maturity of strength and judgment. Hebron had been famous; (Josh. 14: 15.) but Jerusalem was to be more so, and to be the holy city. Great kings affected to raise cities of their own; (Gen. 10: 11.—36: 32—35.) David did so, and Jerusalem was it; the city of David. It is a name famous to the end of the Bible, (Rev. 21.) where we read of a new Jerusalem.

V. 6—10. If Salem was Jerusalem, (as seems probable from Ps. 76: 2.) it was famous in Abraham's time; Joshua, in his time, found it the chief city of the south part of Canaan, Josh. 10: 1—3. It fell to Benjamin's lot, (Josh. 18:28.) but joined close to Judah's, Josh. 15: 8. Judah had taken it, (Judg. 1: 8.) but Benjamin suffered the Jebusites to dwell among them. (Judg. 1: 21.) who grew so upon them, that it became a city of Jebusites, Judg. 19: 11. Now the very first exploit David did, after he was anointed king over all Israel, was, to recover Jerusalem, which, because it belonged to Benjamin, he could not well attempt, till that tribe, which long adhered to Saul's house, (1 Chron. 12: 29.) submitted to him. Here we have,

I. The Jebusites' defiance of David, and his forces, v. 6. They sent David this provoking message, because, as it is said afterward, on another occasion, they could not believe that ever an enemy should enter into the gates of Jerusalem, Lam. 4: 12. They confided, either, 1. In the protection of their gods, which David, in contempt, had called the blind and the lame, for they have eyes and see not, feet and walk not. Some think they were constellated images of brass, set up in the recess of the fort, and intrusted with the custody of the place. Or, 2. In the strength of their fortifications, which [having held good so long] they thought were so impregnable by nature, or art, or both, that the blind and the lame were sufficient to defend them against the most powerful assailant. The strong hold of Zion they especially depended on, as that which could not be forced. Probably, they set invalids or maimed soldiers, to make their appearance on the walls, in scorn of David and his men, judging them an equal match for him. Comp. Jer. 37: 10. Note, the enemies of God's people are often very confident of their own strength, and most secure when their fall draws nigh.

II. David's success. Their insolence, instead of daunting, animated him, and when he made a general assault, he gave this order to his men; 'He that smiteth the Jebusites, let him also throw down in the ditch, or gutter, the lame and the blind, which are set upon the wall to affront us and our God.' Probably they had spoken blasphemous things, and were therefore hated of David's soul. Thus v. 8. may be read; we fetch our reading of it from 1 Chron. 11: 6. which speaks only of smiting the Jebusites, but nothing of the blind and

Verses 6—8.

The last clause (8) may be translated 'They had said, even the blind and the lame, that he shall not come into the house.' But David commanded his men, 'when they smote the Jebusites, to throw down the blind and the lame into the gutter,' or ditch, as it might be rendered; which, under the conduct of Joab, they effected accordingly. These were said to be 'hated of David's soul;' for they were devoted Canaanites and idolaters, if not blasphemers of God.—Near to this mount the ark was placed, the temple built, and the residence of the family of David fixed. But David took, &c.' ED. 'There are two common interpretations of this (1.) It was customary in almost every nation, at the foundation of a city, to lay up an image magically consecrated (a talisman) in some retired part of it, on which the security of the place was supposed to depend. To this the allusion is made. Gregory, Selden. The Jewish writers say, these were of brass, and had inscriptions on them, and the keeping of the place was confidently intrusted to them. In this sense, the passage means, 'unless you remove these gods, which you scornfully call the blind and lame, you will never be able to take the place.' GILL. (2.) They imagined their fortress to be so impregnable, that they told him in scorn the blind and lame could defend it. Bochart, Poole, Gill, Dr. A. Clarke. Invalid troopers could defend it. Wilson. The objection to this interpretation is, that 'the blind and the lame are said (v. 8.) to be 'hated of David's soul.' 'Surely,' says Hewlett, 'the distressing circumstances of blindness and lameness, which rendered these men helpless and impotent, would not of themselves have afforded any foundation for such enmity.' Geddes, followed by Boothroyd, renders the words 'blind and lame,' 'sentinels and patrols,' haiurym vhfshym; and as aier signifies 'to awake, excite, or arouse,' and fsh, 'to pass on,' &c. this interpretation is not unworthy of regard, and the words fully designate the persons here conjectured. Hated of David's soul.] 'If the idols be meant, the cause is obvious, and if the blind and lame men, David hated them as Canaanites.' Henry, Gill, Scott, Clarke. This passage has been variously rendered, 'He that smiteth the Jebusites, let him throw down into the ditch both the blind and the lame, which David doth extremely hate.' Bochart. 'Whosoever first smiteth the Jebusites, and, through the subterraneous passage, or gutter, reacheth the blind and the lame, which are hated by David's soul, because the blind and the lame continued to say, he shall not come into this house, shall be head and captain; so Joab, the son of Zeruiah, went up first, and was chief captain.' Kennicott. 'Whosoever first smiteth the Jebusites, and through the secret passages reacheth the sentinels and patrols, who detest the person of David (because the sentinels and patrols had said, "into this house he shall not come,") he shall be chief captain.' Boothr. COND. "Rabatamana," says Polybius, "a city of Arabia, could not be taken, till one of the prisoners showed the besiegers a subterraneous passage, through which the besieged came down for water. [A son of the editor observed a covered passage of this sort, through which ran a stream of water, cut for a long distance through the soft rock, a kind of rock too like that on which Jerusalem is situated, and communicating with the interior of fort Labdalon, the citadel of Syracuse. It was large enough for a horseman to ride through.—ED.] David had already taken the lower town, ('the strong hold of Zion,' v. 7.) which was spread over the wide hill of Sion, and now, v. 8. takes the citadel, as Rabatamana was taken, through this subterraneous passage; for Josephus expressly calls them subterraneous cavities, thus putting this interpretation on a solid footing.' CARPENTER. Aquila understands an aqueduct, and the Jews say there was an underground passage from the king's house in Jerusalem to Jericho. Dio Cassius speaks of several through which the Jews escaped in the last siege of Jerusalem.' GILL. Much of the rock formation about the Mediterranean is soft underneath, and hardens when exposed to the air; hence subterraneous passages are easily cut, as the vast catacombs of Malta, Syracuse, Naples, Rome, &c. show, Note, Josh. 12: 8. B. C. 1046. 17 ¶ But [i] when the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel, all the Philistines came up to seek David; and David heard of it, and went down to [k] the hold.

18 The Philistines also came, and spread themselves in [l] the valley of Rephaim.

19 And David [m] inquired of the LORD, saying, Shall I go up to the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into mine hand? And [n] the LORD said unto David, Go up; for I will doubtless deliver the Philistines into thine hand.

20 And David came to [o] Baal-perazim, and David smote them there, and said, The LORD hath broken forth upon mine enemies before me, as the breach of waters. Therefore he called the name of that place § Baal-perazim.

21 And there they left their images, and David and his men ‖ burned them.

22 And the Philistines [q] came up yet again, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim.

23 And when David [r] inquired of the LORD, he said, Thou shalt not go up; but [s] fetch a com-

The Jebusites had said, that if their images did not protect them, the blind and the lame should not come into the house, i. e. they would never again trust their palladium, (so Gregory,) nor respect, as they had, their images; and David, having gained the fort, said so too, that these images, which could not protect their worshippers, should never have any place there more.

III. His fixing his royal seat in Zion; he himself dwelt in the fort, and he built houses round about for his attendants and guards, (v. 9.) from Millo (the town-hall, or state-house) and inward. He proceeded and prospered in all he set his hand to: grew more and more honorable in the eyes of his subjects, and formidable in the eyes of his enemies. God has all creatures at his command, makes what use He pleases of them, and serves his own purposes by them; and He was with him, to direct, preserve, and prosper him. Those who grow great, must ascribe it to the presence of God with them, and give Him the glory of it. The church is called Zion, and the city of the living God; Christ's enemies must first be conquered and dispossessed, the blind and the lame taken away, and then Christ divides the spoil, sets up his throne there, and makes it his residence by the Spirit.

V. 11—16. Here is, I. David's house built, a royal palace, fit for the reception of his court, and the homage made him, v. 11. The Jews were husbandmen and shepherds, and did not much addict themselves either to merchandise or manufactures; therefore Hiram, king of Tyre, a wealthy prince, when he sent to congratulate David on his accession to the throne, offered him workmen to build him a house: David thankfully accepted the offer, and Hiram's workmen built David a house to his mind. It is prophesied of the gospel-church, The sons of strangers shall build up thy wall, and their kings shall minister unto thee.

II. David's government rooted and built up, v. 12. 1. His kingdom was established. He that made him king, established him, because he was to be a type of Christ, with whom God's hand should be established, and his covenant stand fast, Ps. 89: 21—28. 2. It was exalted in the eyes both of its friends and enemies. Thus it is promised of Christ, that He shall be higher than the kings of the earth. God has highly exalted Him. 3. David perceived it, by the wonderful concurrence of providences to his establishment and advancement; By this I know that Thou favorest me. Many have the favor and love of God, and do not perceive it, and so want the comfort of it: but to be exalted to that, and established in it, and to perceive it, is happiness enough. 4. He owned it was for his people Israel's sake. God had not made Israel his subjects for his sake, that he might be great, and rich, and absolute; but He made him their king for their sake, that he might lead, and guide, and protect them. Kings should be ministers of God to their people for good, Rom. 13: 4

III. David's family multiplied and increased All the sons born to him after he came to Jerusalem, are here mentioned together; 11 in all; beside the 6 born before in Hebron, ch. 3: 2—5. There the mothers are mentioned, not here; only, in general, that he took him more concubines and wives, v. 13. The bad example of the patriarchs might make him think there was no harm in it, and he might hope it would strengthen his interest, by multiplying his alliances, and increasing the royal family. But one vine by the side of the house, with the blessing of God, may send boughs to the sea, branches to the rivers. Adam, by one wife, peopled the world, and Noah repeopled it. David had many wives, yet that did not keep him from coveting his neighbor's wife, and defiling her; men that have once broken the fence, will wander endlessly. Of David's concubines, see ch. 15: 16. 16: 22. 19: 3. Of his sons, see 1 Chr. 3: 5.

V. 17—25. The particular service David was raised up for, was, to save Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, ch. 3: 18. This therefore Divine Providence, in the first place, gives him an opportunity of accomplishing. Two great victories obtained over the Philistines we have here an account of, by which David not only balanced the disgrace, and retrieved the loss, Israel had sustained in the battle wherein Saul was slain, but went far toward the total subduing of those vexatious neighbors, the last remains of the devoted nations.

I. In both these actions, the Philistines were the aggressors. 1. In the former, they came up to seek David, (v. 17.) because they heard that he was anointed king over Israel. He that under Saul had slain his ten thousands, what would he do when he himself came to be king? They therefore thought it time to look about them, and try to crush his government in its infancy. Their success against Saul, some years ago, perhaps, encouraged them; but they considered not that David had that presence of God with him, which Saul had not. The kingdom of the Messiah, as soon as it was set up in the world, was thus vigorously attacked by the powers of darkness, who, with the combined force both of Jews and Gentiles, made head against it: the heathen raged, and the kings of the earth set themselves to oppose it; but all in vain, Ps. 2: 1, &c. They took counsel together, but were broken in pieces. 2. In the latter, they came up yet again, hoping to recover what they had lost in the former, their hearts being hardened to their destruction, v. 22. 3. In both, they spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim, very near Jerusalem; which they hoped to master, before David had completed his fortifications. Their spreading themselves, intimates they were very numerous, and made a very formidable appearance. We read of the church's enemies going upon the breadth of the earth; but the further they spread themselves, the fairer mark they are to God's arrows.

II. In both, David, though forward enough to go against them, (v. 17.) yet entered not upon action, till he had inquired of the Lord by the breast-plate of judgment, v. 19, 23. His inquiry was twofold. 1. Concerning his duty; 'Shall I go up? Shall I have a commission from Heaven to engage them?' or, 'Shall I go up now?' It is to be done, but is it to be done at this time? In all thy ways acknowledge Him. And besides, though the Philistines were public enemies, yet some, as Achish, had been his particular friends. 'Now,' says David, 'ought not I rather to make peace with them, than war?' 'No,' says God, 'they are Israel's enemies, and are doomed to destruction, therefore never scruple it, but go up.' 2. Concerning his success. His conscience asked the former question, his prudence asked this, Wilt Thou deliver them into my hand? Hereby he owns his dependence, and refers himself to the good pleasure of God, Wilt Thou do it? Yea, says God, I will doubtless do it. The assurance God gives us of victory over our spiritual enemies, should animate us in our spiritual conflicts. We do not fight at uncertainty. David had now a great army at command, and in good heart, yet he relied more on God's promise than his own force.

III. In the former of these engagements, David routed the Philistines by dint of sword, (v. 20.) he smote them; and when he had done, 1. He gave his God the glory; v. 20. 'I could not have done it, if He had not done it before me.' Most of the work was God's doing; nay, He did all; therefore, Not unto us, but unto the Lord, give glory. He hoped likewise this breach would let in a final desolation upon them: and, to perpetuate the remembrance of it, he called the place Baal-perazim, the Master of the breaches. Let posterity notice it to God's honor. 2. He put their gods to shame. They brought the images of their gods into the field, as their protectors, in imitation of the Israelites' bringing the ark into their camp: but being put to flight, they could not stay to carry them off; therefore they left them to fall, with the rest of their baggage, into the hands of the conqueror. God can make men weary of those things they have been most fond of, and compel them to desert what they doted on, and cast away even their idols of silver and of gold, Isa. 2: 20, 21. David and his men converted to their own use the rest of the plunder, but burnt the images, as God had appointed. (Deut. 7: 5.) Patrick well observes here, that when the ark fell into the Philistines' hands, it consumed them, but when these images fell into the hands of Israel, they could not save themselves from being consumed.

IV. In the latter of these engagements, God gave David some sensible tokens of his presence with him, bade him not fall upon them directly, as he had done before, but fetch a compass behind them. v. 23. He promised him to charge the enemy Himself, by an invisible host of angels, v. 24. Angels tread light, and He that can walk upon the clouds, can, when He pleases, walk on the tops of trees, or, (as Patrick understands it,) at the head of the mulberry tree; i. e. of the wood, or hedge-row, of those trees. 'And by that sign thou shalt know that the Lord goes out before thee, to smite the host of the Philistines.' But observe, though God promised to go before them and smite the Philistines, yet David, when he heard the sound of the going, must bestir himself, and be ready to pursue the victory. Note, God's grace must quicken our endeavors. If God work in us both to will and to do, it does not follow that we must sit still, as those that have nothing to do, but we must therefore work out our salvation with all possible care and diligence. The sound of the going was a signal to David when to move; and perhaps an alarm to the enemy, to put them into confusion. Hearing the march of an army against their front, they retreated with precipitation, and fell into David's army, which lay behind them in their rear. Of those whom God fights against, it is said, The sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them.

The success of this is briefly set down, v. 25. David observed his orders, and God performed his promise. When the kingdom of the Messiah was to be set up, the apostles must not attempt any thing till they received the promise of the Spirit; who came with a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind; and when they heard that, they must bestir themselves, and did so; they went forth conquering and to conquer.

CHAP. VI. The obscurity of the ark, during the reign of Saul, had been as great a grievance to Israel as the insults of the Philistines. David having humbled the Philistines, in gratitude, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Mercies, long waited for in faith and patience, will be conferred in the most reputable and comfortable manner: nor shall any go unrewarded, who persist in refusing to employ sinful means for their own deliverance, or advancement.—Civil government is fixed on its firmest basis, and is likely to produce the most permanent blessings, when it is regulated by wholesome laws; marking out duties, prerogatives, and privileges to the prince and people, and reciprocally ratified, as in the presence of the Lord, by the most solemn assurances, with a view to his authority, appointments, and commandments.—Jesus became our Brother, assumed and inhabits our nature, that He might be our Prince and Savior: and thus the humbled sinner takes encouragement from this endearing relation: applies for his salvation, voluntarily submits to his kind authority, and craves his powerful protection.—In the day of his power, Satan's strong-hold, the human heart, is converted into 'an habitation of God through the Spirit;' and into a throne, on which the Son of David rules, and brings every thought into obedience to Himself. May He thus come and claim and cleanse each of our hearts; and, having destroyed every idol, may He dwell and reign there for ever. (Gal. 2: 17—21. Eph. 2: 19—22. 3: 14—19.)—It is in mercy to a nation, when wise and righteous persons are exalted to authority: and every advancement or endowment which we receive, should remind us, that the Lord alone has conferred the distinction; and that He did it, that we might be useful to his people by the talents intrusted to us.—(1 Kings 3: 5—14. P. O. 1—15.) Alas! even good men are apt to grow secure and self-indulgent in prosperity, and to sanction by their example those abuses, which they should oppose or repress: and all our returns for the Lord's mercies are deeply tinged with ingratitude.—In our spiritual warfare, we must decidedly declare for the Lord, though against relatives or benefactors; and if we consult Him, He will teach us to do it without even the appearance of evil.—All those objects which men idolize, will prove a useless encumbrance to them, when 'the Lord shall arise to execute judgment on his enemies.' SCOTT.

Verse 25.

And David did so.] 'He punctually obeyed the directions of the Lord, and then every thing succeeded to his wish. Why are such directions and assistances not communicated now? Because they are not asked for; and not asked for, because not expected; and they are not expected, because men have not faith: and they have not faith, because they are under a refined spirit of atheism, and have no spiritual intercourse with their Maker. Who believes that God sees all things, and is every where? Who supposes that He concerns Himself with the affairs of his creatures? Who acknowledges Him in all his ways? Who puts not his own wisdom, prudence and strength in the place of God Almighty? Reader, hast thou faith in God? Then exercise it, cultivate it, and thou mayest remove mountains.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

in pursuance of his designs for the public welfare, is here bringing up the ark to his own city, that it might be near him, an ornament and strength to his new foundation.

V. 1—5. We have not heard a word of the ark, since it was lodged in Kirjath-jearim, immediately after its return out of its captivity among the Philistines, (1 Sam. 7: 1, 2.) except that, once, Saul called for it, 1 Sam. 14: 18. Let it not seem strange that we find the church so long in the wilderness, Rev. 12: 14 Perpetual visibility is no mark of the true church. God is graciously present with the souls of his people, when they want the external tokens of his presence. But now that David is settled in the throne, the honor of the ark begins to revive. Here is, I. An honorable mention made of the ark, v. 2. Let us learn hence, 1. To think and speak highly of God. His is the name above every name; the Lord of hosts, that has all creatures in heaven and earth at his command, and receives homage from them all, yet is pleased to dwell between the cherubim, over the propitiatory, or mercy-seat, graciously manifesting Himself to his people, reconciled in a Mediator, and ready to do them good. 2. To think and speak honorably of holy ordinances, which are to us, as the ark to Israel, the tokens of God's presence, (Mat. 23: 20.) and the means of our communion with Him, Ps. 27: 4. It is the honor of the ark, that it is the ark of God, He is jealous for it, is magnified in it, his name is called upon it. The divine institution puts a beauty and grandeur on holy ordinances, which otherwise have no form nor comeliness. Christ is our Ark, in and by Him God manifests his favor, and communicates his grace to us, and accepts our adorations and addresses.

II. An honorable attendance given to the ark on its removal. David made the motion, (1 Chr. 13: 1—3.) and the heads of the congregation agreed to it, v. 4. All the chosen men of Israel, the nobility and gentry, elders and officers, came, to the number of 30,000, (v. 1.) and the generality of the common people besides; (1 Chr. 13: 5.) some think, it was done at one of the three great festivals. This would help to inspire the young, who, perhaps, had scarcely heard of the ark, with a great veneration for it.

III. Great expressions of joy, on its removal, v. 5. David himself, and all with him that were musically inclined, used such instruments as they had, to excite and express their rejoicing on this occasion. It might well put them into a transport of joy, to see the ark rise out of obscurity, and move towards a public station. As secret worship is better, the more secret it is, so public worship is better, the more public it is: and we have reason to rejoice, when restraints are taken off; for joy of this, they played before the Lord. Note, Public joy must always be as before the Lord, with an eye to Him, and terminating in Him; and must not degenerate into that which is carnal and sensual. Lightfoot supposes that, on this occasion, David penned Ps. 68. because it begins with that ancient prayer of Moses, at the removing of the ark, Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered; and notice is taken there (v. 25.) of the singers and players on instruments that attended, and (v. 27.) of the princes of several of the tribes; and perhaps those words in the last verse, O God, Thou art terrible out of thy holy places, were added on occasion of the death of Uzzah.

IV. An error they were guilty of, in carrying the ark in a cart or carriage, whereas the priests should have carried it on their shoulders, v. 3. The Kohathites, who had the charge of the ark, had no wagons assigned them, because their service was to bear it on their shoulders, Num. 7: 9. The ark was no such heavy burden, but that they might, among them, have carried it as far as Mt. Zion on their shoulders; they needed not put it in a cart, like a common thing. The Philistines knew no better. I wonder how so wise and good a man as David, that conversed so much with the masculine, the latter feminine,) was another name for Kirjath-jearim. (Josh. 15:9, 60. 1 Chr. 13:6. 1 Sam. 7:1,2,17. 1 Chr. 13:1—4.)—The terms used in speaking of the ark are very expressive of reverence. The name of JEHOVAH Sabaoth, the LORD of hosts, was, as it were, affixed to the ark, because it was the most honored external representation of his invisible glory: and when the ark was in its proper place, in the holy of holies, the Lord manifested his presence, by the visible glory above it, as the Protector and Glory of Israel. It especially typified Christ, and his merits and mediation, in which the name of JEHOVAH, and all his glorious excellences are harmoniously displayed, while all his hosts of angels, (represented by 'the cherubim,') desire to look down into those mysteries, or to be employed by Him who is the Savior and Glory of his redeemed people, and whom sinners now approach upon a mercy seat. (Notes, Ex. 25:10—22. Ps. 80:1. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) SCOTT.

Verse 3.

David and the Israelites seem to have taken the Philistines for their precedent on this occasion, (Notes, 1 Sam. 6:2—16.) instead of consulting the law of God! (Note, Num. 7:4—9.) It is probable, Abinadab and Eleazar his son were dead before this time, as the ark had continued at Kirjath-jearim at least seventy years; (Note, 1 Sam. 7:1,2.) There is no proof that Uzzah and Ahio were Levites; though some expositors think they were: and if any of the priests attended, they seem not to have taken an active part in the service. Gibeah signifies the hill, and means that division of the city, in which the house of Abinadab stood. law of God, came to be guilty of such an oversight. We will charitably hope it was because he was so extremely intent on the substance of the service, that he forgot to take care of this circumstance.

V. 6—11. We have here Uzzah struck dead for touching the ark, when on its journey to the city of David; a sad providence, which damped their mirth, stopped the progress of the ark, and, for the present, dispersed this great assembly in a fright.

I. Uzzah's offence seemed very small, v. 6. The critics are not agreed about the signification of the original word for shook: They stumbled; so our margin: They kicked; so some; perhaps, against the goad with which Uzzah drove them. They stuck in the mire, so some. By some accident or other, the ark was in danger of being overthrown. Uzzah was a Levite, but priests only might touch the ark. The law was express concerning the Kohathites, that though they were to carry the ark by the staves, yet they must not touch any holy thing, lest they die, Num. 4: 15. Uzzah's long familiarity with the ark, and the constant attendance he had given to it, might occasion his presumption, but would not excuse it.

II. His punishment for this offence seems very great, v. 7. In sacred things, God is a jealous God. He smote him there for his rashness, so the word is, struck him dead on the spot, by the ark of God; even the mercy-seat would not save him. 1. God, by this instance of severity, would show how He might justly have dealt with our first parents, when they had eaten that which was forbidden under the same penalty, lest ye die. 2. God saw the presumption and irreverence of Uzzah's heart. Perhaps he affected to show, before this great assembly, how bold he could make with the ark, having been so long acquainted with it. 3. David afterward owned, Uzzah died for an error they were all guilty of, 1 Chr. 15: 13. But Uzzah was singled out, perhaps, because most forward in advising that way of conveyance; however, he had fallen into another error, occasioned by that. Perhaps, the ark was not covered, as it should have been, with badgers' skins, (Num. 4: 6.) and that was a further provocation. 4. God would hereby awe the thousands of Israel, convince them the ark was never the less venerable for its having been so long in mean circumstances, and thus teach them to rejoice with trembling, and always to treat holy things with reverence and holy fear. 5. God would hereby teach us that a good intention would not justify a bad action. He can and will secure his ark, and needs not any man's sin to help him to do it. 6. If it were so great a crime for one to lay hold on the ark of the covenant, that had no right to do so, what is it for those to lay claim to the privileges of the covenant, that come not up to the terms of it? Ps. 50: 16. Heb. 10: 29.

III. David's feelings on this infliction, were keen, and perhaps not altogether as they should have been. He should have humbled himself under God's hand, confessed the error, acknowledged God's righteousness, and deprecated the further tokens of his displeasure, and then have gone on with the good work he had in hand. But

1. He was displeased; it is not said because Uzzah had affronted God, but because God had made a breach on Uzzah, v. 8. the same word is used for God's displeasure, v. 7. David did not now act like himself, like a man after God's own heart. It is not for us to be displeased at any thing God does, how unpleasing soever it is to us. When we lie under God's anger, we must keep under our own.

2. He was afraid, v. 9. it should seem, with amazement; for he said, How shall the ark of the Lord come to me? As if God sought advantages against all that were about Him, and was so extremely tender of his ark, there was no dealing with it; therefore better keep it at a distance. He should rather have said, 'Let the ark come to me, and I will take warning by this to treat it with more reverence.' Provoke Me not, (says God, Jer. 25: 6.) and I will do you no hurt. Or, this may be looked upon as a good use of this tremendous judgment; he did not say, 'Surely, Uzzah was a sinner above all men,' but is concerned for himself, as one conscious, not only of his own unworthiness of God's favor, but his obnoxiousness to God's displeasure. This God intends in his judgments, that others may hear and fear. David therefore will not bring the ark into his own city, (v. 10.) till he is better prepared for its reception.

3. He took care to perpetuate the remembrance of this stroke, by a new name he gave the place, Perez-uzzah, the breach of Uzzah, v. 8. The memorial would be a warning to posterity, to take heed of all rashness and irreverence in dealing about holy things; for God will be sanctified in those that come nigh unto Him.

4. He lodged the ark in a good house, that of Obed-edom, a Levite, where the disaster happen-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. Our judgment in religion must be regulated by the word of God, and not by the customs of the world, or even of the church: for human inventions have often long prevailed, when divine appointments have grown into disuse and contempt. But true believers are accepted, notwithstanding such errors and abuses as they either do not discern, or are unable to rectify: yet those, who have it in their power, should embrace the first opportunity of replacing matters upon the scriptural foundation, and of bringing to light and reputation those parts of true religion, which have been most neglected and obscured. That the LORD dwells upon the mercy-seat, 'between the cherubim,' that the name and perfections of JEHOVAH are in Jesus, the true Ark of the covenant, forms the foundation of every genuine human hope of felicity, and is the source of every believer's privileges and comforts: while, with all his hosts and all his authority, God is his reconciled Friend, Father, and Protector. Whatever else may be overlooked, these essential truths should be always placed in the most convincing and conspicuous light, in every sermon and religious ordinance; that sinners may be called on to believe, and believers to rejoice, and glorify God our Savior.—In the fervency of zeal we are all very prone to forget the precepts of God; and are too eager about the substance of our services, to consult the Scriptures concerning the right method of conducting them.—But while one is disheartened from active service through servile fear, others will be animated with humble faith and hope; and not dread the ark, or the ordinance, but only the sin which occasioned the rebuke, or against which the threatening is denounced. And the Lord will abundantly recompense those, who are humbly bold for Him, while others are either presumptuous or desponding. (P. O. 1 Sam. 6:) SCOTT.

thus touched the ark during all the years it had remained with them. Uzzah, it is probable, had become too familiar with this sacred symbol of the Lord's especial presence. No doubt the Lord saw, in his conduct, what indicated irreverence and presumption; not wholly unlike the sin of Nadab and Abihu, when they offered strange fire before Him: and therefore He smote him, perhaps in a similar manner, and for the same reasons. (Notes, Lev. 10:1—5. 1 Sam. 6:19—21.) His death was a pointed rebuke and warning to David, to the priests, and to all Israel. SCOTT.

Verses 8, 9.

David's heart was upright, and his zeal and love very fervent: but there were many things very faulty in his frame of mind, as well as irregular in his proceedings, on this occasion. He seems to have been possessed with some measure of self-complacency, on account of the important service he was performing, in honoring the ark after it had been so long neglected; and to have thought that the goodness of the work would counterbalance a degree of informality in the manner of doing it, and ensure to him comfort and commendation: and he had not taken time to examine the law of God, or to consult the priests how this good work ought to be performed. When therefore the event turned out contrary to his expectations, he was greatly disconcerted, and his lively religious affections were extinguished. He was angry, (so the word signifies,) that occasion had been given for this unexpected stroke; though it does not appear with whom he was displeased, and certainly his anger implied a degree of rebellion against the dispensation of God in smiting Uzzah! A measure of servile fear succeeded to zeal, hope, and joy: so that he would not venture to bring the ark any nearer to him, lest he should be destroyed in like manner. (Num. 17:12,13. Josh. 7:6—9. 1 Sam. 6:19—21. 1 Chr. 15:12—14. Ps. 119:120. Is. 6:5.) SCOTT.

ed, v. 10, 11. Obed-edom knew what slaughter the ark had made among the Philistines that imprisoned it, and the Bethshemites that looked into it. He saw Uzzah struck dead for touching it, and perceived David himself afraid of meddling with it; yet he cheerfully invites it to his own house, and opens his doors to it without fear, knowing it was a savor of death unto death, to those only that treated it ill. 'Oh the courage,' says Bp. Hall, 'of an honest and faithful heart; nothing can make God otherwise than amiable to his own: even his very justice is lovely.' And now the same hand that punished Uzzah rewarded Obed-edom. Let none think the worse of the Gospel for the judgments inflicted on those that reject it, but set in opposition to them the blessings it brings to those that duly receive it. None ever had, or ever shall have reason to say, that it is in vain to serve God. Let masters of families be encouraged to keep up religion in their families, and to serve God and the interests of his kingdom, with their houses and estates, for that is the way to bring a blessing on all they have. The ark is a guest which none shall lose by, that bid it welcome Josephus says, that whereas, before, Obed-edom was poor, on a sudden, in these three months, his estate increased, to the envy of his neighbors. Piety is the best friend to prosperity. In wisdom's left hand are riches and honor. His household shared in the blessing: it is good to live in a family that entertains the ark, for all about it will fare the better for it.

V. 12—19. We have here a second attempt to bring the ark home to the city of David. It should seem, the blessing on Obed-edom for the ark's sake, was a great inducement to David, (v. 12.) For, it was an evidence, 1. That God was reconciled to them, and his anger turned away; and if God be at peace with them, they can cheerfully go on with their design. 2. That the ark was not such a burdensome stone, as it was taken to be, but, on the contrary, happy was the man that had it near him. Christ is indeed a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence, to them that are disobedient; but to them which believe, a Corner-stone, elect, precious. Note, The experience others have had of the gains of godliness, should encourage us to be religious.

1. David now rectified the former error, and ordered those, whose business it was, to carry it on their shoulders. This is implied here, (v. 13.) and expressed, 1 Chr. 15: 15. Then we make a good use of the judgments of God on ourselves and others, when we are awakened by them to reform and amend whatever has been amiss.

2. At their first setting out, he offered sacrifices to God, (v. 13.) by way of atonement for their former errors, and in thankful acknowledgment of the blessings bestowed on the house of Obed-edom. Then we are likely to speed in our enterprises, when we begin with God, and give diligence to make our peace with Him. When we attend on God in holy ordinances, our eye must be to the great Sacrifice, to which we owe it that we are taken into covenant and communion, Ps. 50: 5.

3. He himself attended the solemnity with the highest expressions of joy, (v. 14.) His dancing, I suppose, was not artificial, by any certain rule or measure, nor do we find that any danced with him; but it was a natural expression of his great joy and exultation of mind. He laid aside his imperial purple, and put on a plain ephod, which was light and convenient for dancing, and was used in religious exercises by those who were no priests, for Samuel wore one, 1 Sam. 2: 18. That great prince thought it no disparagement to appear in the habit of a minister to the ark.

4. All the people triumphed in this advancement of the ark; v. 15. expressing their own joy in loud acclamations, and giving notice to all about them to rejoice with them. The public and free administration of ordinances, not only under the protection, but under the smiles, of the civil powers, is just matter of rejoicing to any people.

5. The ark was safely brought to, and honorably deposited in, the place prepared for it, v. 17. namely, a tabernacle, or tent, David had pitched for it; not the tabernacle Moses reared, but in imitation of that; that was at Gibeon, (2 Chr. 1: 13.) and, we may suppose, gone to decay, but this was a tent set up on purpose. As soon as it was lodged, he offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, in thankful supplication to God for the continuance of his favor. Note, All our joys must be sanctified both with praises and prayers; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased. Now, it should seem, he penned Ps. 132.

6. The people were then dismissed with great satisfaction. He prayed God to bless them, and rewarded them for the honor and respect they had now shown, with a generous treat; for so it was, rather than a distribution of alms; the great men, probably, he entertained at his own house, but the multitude, at their respective quarters, and this he did; 1. in token of his joy and gratitude to God, and when the heart is enlarged by cheerfulness, that should open the hand in liberality; Esth. 9. 22. to recommend himself to the people, and confirm his interest in them; for every one is a friend to him that giveth gifts.

V. 20—23. David, having dismissed the congregation with a blessing, returned to bless his household; (v. 20.) i. e. to pray with and for them, and to offer family-thanksgiving for this national on Uzzah. His mind was also become calm; and his zeal, love, and joy, had revived. Having likewise learned that none but the Levites of the family of Kohath ought to carry the ark, (1 Chr. 15:) his 'love now abounded in knowledge, and in all judgment.' (Phil. 1:9—11.) Conscious therefore that he was unworthy of being employed in such a service, and sensible of his cause for gratitude, if preserved from grievous miscarriages, he set out with offering sacrifices: and, as he thus united humble faith and holy fear with his fervent affections, he was accepted and prospered accordingly. (Judg. 20:26—28.) SCOTT.

(13.) Bare the ark.] Since writing the notes on Ex. 25:10—17. the Ed. finds on one of the most ancient monuments of Egypt, an ark in a religious procession, with emblems on its sides, and images on its top. The length is exactly two thirds of the height of the 4 bare-headed, shaven figures, who bear it by the staves upon their shoulders. ED.

Verses 14, 15.

(M. R. v.) It does not appear that David in the least attempted to encroach on the priestly office.—The methods here adopted by the Israelites in expressing joy and gratitude, were customary among them; and the music, blowing of trumpets, and sacred dances, were accompanied with psalms of praise, sung to the glory of God, by great multitudes in concert. (Ex. 15:20,21. 2 Chr. 15: 16:) SCOTT.

(14.) Danced, comp. with v. 5. David played.] A cut is given of a dancing figure who plays; it is from a representation of a religious festival found at Herculaneum, and shows an ancient form of the harp, as well as the method of playing while dancing. ED.

Verse 16.

Michal seems to have had no deep sense of the importance and excellency of heavenly things: but she was possessed with high thoughts of temporal dignity and royalty. Perhaps, she considered David's zeal as a reproach of her father's negligence. SCOTT.

Verse 17.

18 And as soon [d] as David had made an end of offering burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, [e] he blessed the people in the name of the LORD of hosts.

19 And [f] he dealt among all the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, to every one a cake of bread, and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine. [g] So all the people departed every one to his house.

20 Then David returned to [h] bless his household. And [i] Michal the daughter of Saul came out to meet David, and said, How [k] glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who [l] uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the [m] vain fellows [*] shamelessly uncovereth himself!

21 And David said unto Michal, It was [n] before the LORD, which [o] chose me before thy father, and before all his house, to appoint me ruler over the people of the LORD, over Israel: therefore will I [p] play before the LORD.

22 And I will yet be [q] more vile than thus, and will be base [*] in mine own sight: and of the † maid-servants, which thou hast spoken of, of them shall [r] I be had in honor.

23 Therefore [t] Michal the daughter of Saul had no child [u] unto the day of her death.

mercy. Ministers must not think their public performances will excuse from family worship; David, though he had prophets, priests, and Levites, about him, to be his chaplains, yet did not devolve the work on them, but himself blessed his household: It is angels' work to worship God, and therefore surely can be no disparagement to the greatest men.

Never did David return to his house with so much pleasure and satisfaction, as now, and yet even this joyful day concluded with some uneasiness, occasioned by the pride and peevishness of his wife. Even the palaces of princes are not exempt from domestic troubles. Michal thought he degraded himself, in dancing before the ark. She thought his mighty zeal for the ark of God, and the transport of joy he was in, on its coming home to him, was but a foolish thing, and unbecoming so great a soldier, statesman, and monarch: it had been enough to encourage the devotion of others, but she looked upon it as a thing below him to appear so very devout himself. Note, The exercises of religion appear very mean to those that have little or no religion themselves. She was so full of disdain and indignation, that she could not hold her peace till she had him in private, but went out to meet him with reproaches.

Observe, 1. How she taunted him, v. 20. Her contempt of him and his devotion began in the heart, but out of the abundance of that the mouth spake. What displeased her, was his affection to the ark; but she basely represents his conduct, in dancing before the ark, as lewd and immodest. We have no reason to think this was true in fact: David, no doubt, observed decorum, and governed his zeal with discretion; but it is common for those that reproach religion, thus to put false colors on it, and lay it under the most odious characters. To have abused any man thus, for his pious zeal, had been very profane; but to abuse her own husband thus, whom she ought to reverence, and one whose prudence and virtue were above the reach of malice itself to disparage, one who had showed such affection for her, that he would not accept a crown, unless he might have her restored to him, (ch. 3: 13.) was a most base and wicked thing, and showed her to have more of Saul's daughter in her, than of David's wife, or Jonathan's sister.

2. How he replied to her reproach.

(1.) He designed thereby to honor God, v. 21. Notwithstanding her invidious construction, he had the testimony of his conscience, that he sincerely aimed at the glory of God. Here he reminds her indeed of the setting aside of her father's house, to make way for him to the throne, that she might not think herself the most proper judge of propriety. 'If the expressions of a warm devotion to God were looked upon as mean and unfashionable in thy father's court, yet I will play before the Lord, and thereby bring them into reputation again.' Note, [1.] We should be afraid of censuring the devotion of others, though it may not agree with our sentiments, because, for aught we know, the heart may be upright in it. [2.] If we can approve ourselves to God in what we do in religion, we need not value the censures and reproaches of men. [3.] The more we are vilified for well doing, the more resolute we should be in it. I will be yet more vile.

(2.) He designed thereby to humble himself. In the throne of judgment, and in the field of battle, none shall do more to support the grandeur, honor and authority of a prince, than David; but in acts of devotion he lays aside the thoughts of majesty, humbles himself to the dust before the Lord, joins in with the meanest services done in honor of the ark, and yet thinks it no diminution to him. The greatest of men is less than the least of the ordinances of Jesus Christ.

(3.) He doubted not but even this would turn to his reputation, among those whose reproach she feared. The common people, so far from thinking the worse of him for these pious condescensions, would esteem and honor him the more. The truly pious are sometimes manifested in the consciences even of those that speak ill of them. Let us never be driven from our duty by the fear of reproach. Piety will have its praise: let us not then be indifferent in it, nor afraid or ashamed to own it.

God punished Michal's insolence by writing her for ever childless from this time forward, v. 23. They that honor God, He will honor; but those that despise Him, and his servants and service, shall be lightly esteemed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12—23. When pious men, who have been betrayed into unwarrantable conduct, have had time for self-examination, searching the Scriptures, and prayer, they will discover and confess their mistakes, and be reduced to a better temper; justify God in his corrections; profit by their own errors; stand the stronger for their falls, and not abate in their zeal and affections, but learn to connect them with humility, and to regulate them according to the precepts of the sacred Scripture. Then they may expect to prosper in their attempts to glorify God, and promote the cause of true religion.—We are so unworthy, and our services so defiled, that all our joy in divine ordinances must be connected with the exercise of repentance, and faith in the Redeemer's atoning blood; so that the more we are preserved from sin, and the more we are enabled to do in the work of God, with acceptance and comfort, the greater obligations we are brought under, and the more thankful we ought to be. (1 Chr. 29: 10—19.)—Proud and carnal persons have always ridiculed fervent devotion, as folly or enthusiasm. Satan has long deluded men into a persuasion, that such holy earnestness is unbecoming persons of genius, learning, wealth, or influence; and only fit for ignorant, poor people, women, or children. But if the Lord has chosen and accepted us, we should deem such reproaches honorable, and determine to become still more vile in the eyes of ungodly revilers, by abounding in those services which they despise. —Piety should always be attended with liberality.—Finally, in this removal of the ark, let us contemplate the Redeemer's ascension to glory, and seek to participate his precious gifts, and to serve Him with ardent love and joy. SCOTT.

round about from all his enemies,

2 That the king said unto [c] Nathan the prophet, See now, [d] I dwell in an house of cedar, but [e] the ark of God dwelleth within [f] curtains.

3 And Nathan said to the king, [g] Go, do [h] all that is in thine heart: [i] for the LORD is with thee.

4 And it came to pass [j] that night, that the word of the LORD came unto Nathan, saying,

5 Go and tell [*] my servant David, Thus saith the LORD, [k] Shalt thou build me an house for me to dwell in?

6 Whereas [l] I have not dwelt in any house since the time that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have [m] walked in a [n] tent and in a tabernacle.

7 In all the places wherein I have walked with all the children of Israel, spake I a word with any of the [o] tribes of Israel, whom I commanded to [p] feed my people Israel, saying, Why build ye not me an house of cedar?

8 Now therefore so shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, [q] I took thee from the sheep-cote, from [†] following the sheep, to be [r] ruler over my people, over Israel.

9 And [s] I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest, and have [t] cut off all thine enemies [‡] out of thy sight, and have made thee [u] a great name, [x] like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth.

10 Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will [y] plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; [z] neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, [a] as before-time,

11 And as [b] since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel, and [c] have caused thee to rest from all thine enemies. Also the LORD telleth thee, that [d] he will make thee an house.

12 And [e] when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt [f] sleep with thy fathers, [g] I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom.

13 [h] He shall build an house for my name, and [i] I will establish the return for the honors God had put upon him. Note, When God, in his providence, has remarkably done much for us, it should put us on contriving what we may do for Him and his glory. What shall I render unto the Lord? And when He gives us rest, and finds us little to do of worldly business, we must do so much the more for God and our souls. How different David's thoughts, when he sat in his palace, from Nebuchadnezzar's, when he walked in his! That proud man thought of nothing but the might of his own power, and the honor of his own majesty; this humble soul is full of contrivance how to glorify God, and honor Him; and how God resisted the proud, and gave grace and glory to the humble, the event showed. David thought of the incongruousness, that he should dwell in a palace, and the ark in a tent. He had been uneasy till he found out a place for the ark, (Ps. 132: 4, 5.) and now he is uneasy till he finds out a better place. Gracious, grateful souls never think they can do enough for God, but when they have done much, are still projecting to do more, and devising liberal things. They cannot enjoy their own accommodations, while they see the church of God in distress and under a cloud. Those who stretched themselves upon beds of ivory, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph, though they had David's music, had not David's spirit; (Amos 6: 4—6.) nor they who dwelt in their ceiled houses, while God's house lay waste, Hag. 1: 4.

III. His communicating his thought to the prophet. David told Nathan, that by him he might know the mind of God. It was certainly a good work; but it was uncertain whether it was the will of God, that David should have the doing of it.

IV. Nathan approves it. v. 3. Note, We ought to do all we can, to encourage and promote the good purposes and designs of others. Nathan spoke this, not in God's name, but as from himself; not as a prophet, but as a wise and good man; it was agreeable to the revealed will of God, which requires that all in their places should lay out themselves for the advancement of religion and the service of God, though, it seems, the secret will was otherwise, that David should not do this. It was Christ's prerogative always to speak the mind of God, which He perfectly knew; other prophets spake it only when the spirit of prophecy was upon them; but if in any thing they mistook, (as Samuel, 1 Sam. 16: 6. and Nathan here,) God soon rectified the mistake.

V. 4—17. We have here a full revelation of God's favor to David, by Nathan the prophet. Nathan might not continue long in an error, nor David have his head any further filled with thoughts of that, which he must never bring to pass. God might have said this to David Himself immediately, but He chose to send it by Nathan, to support the honor of his prophets, and to preserve in David a regard to them.

Now, in this message,

I. David's purpose to build God a house is superseded. God noticed that purpose, and was well pleased with it, as appears, 1 K. 8: 18. yet He forbade him to go on with his purpose, (v. 5. as explained in the parallel place, 1 Chron. 17: 4.) David is a man of war, and must enlarge the borders of Israel, by carrying on their conquests; he is a sweet psalmist, and must prepare psalms for the use of the temple when it is built, and settle the courses of the Levites; but his son's genius will better suit for building the house, and he will have a better treasure to bear the charge of it, therefore let it be reserved for him. As every man hath received the gift, so let him minister.

The building of a temple was to be a work of time, and preparation made for it; but it was a thing that had never been spoken of till now. David, in his Psalms, often calls the tabernacle a temple, (as Ps. 5: 7.—27: 4.—29: 9.—65: 4.—138: 2.) because it answered the intention of a temple, though made but of curtains: wise and good men value not the show, while they have the substance. David perhaps had more true devotion, and sweeter communion with God, in a house of curtains, than any of his successors in the house of cedar. Better a tent of God's appointing, than a temple of his own inventing.

II. David is reminded of the great things God had done for him, to let him know he was a favorite of Heaven, though he had not the favor to be employed in this service: as also that God

CHAP. VII. V. 5. Shalt thou &c.] It appears that Nathan spoke more to David than is here recorded: for other reasons are afterwards given, why David was not permitted to build the temple. (2 Chr. 22:6—10. 28:2—8.) SCOTT.

Eusebius mentions, that a story of David, founded on this, was preserved in the writings of Eupolemus, a heathen, who varies the narrative a little: see Gill. ED.

Verses 6, 7.

Though the building of a temple accorded with the spirit of the Mosaic dispensation, it was not commanded by any law; and was not therefore peculiarly any one's duty, without some further intimation from God. Nor was it necessary either to the glory of God, or the good of Israel, to have a temple; and the erecting of one might therefore very well be delayed a little longer. (Is. 66:1,2. Acts 7:44—50.) 1. Some of these promises relate to Solomon, his immediate successor, and to the royal line of Judah. (1.) God would advance him to the throne. David's government was the first that was entailed; for the promise made to Christ, of the kingdom, was to reach to his spiritual seed: if children, then heirs. (2.) He would settle him in the throne, I will establish his kingdom, v. 12. The throne of his kingdom, v. 13. His title shall be clear and uncontested, his interest confirmed, and his administration steady. 3. He would employ him in that good work of building the temple, which David had only the satisfaction of designing. He shall build a house for my name, v. 13. The work shall be done, though David do it not. (4.) He would take him into the covenant of adoption, v. 14, 15. We need no more to make us and ours happy, than to have God to be a Father to us and them: and if He be a careful, tender, bountiful Father to us, we must be obedient, tractable, dutiful children to Him. The promise here speaks as unto sons. [1.] That his Father would correct him, when there was occasion. Afflictions are an article of the covenant, and are not only consistent with, but flow from, God's fatherly love. 'I will consider his frame, and correct him with all possible tenderness and compassion, and no more than there is need of; it shall be with the stripes, the touches,' (so the word is,) 'of the children of men; not a stroke, or wound, but a gentle touch.' [2.] That yet He would not disinherit him, v. 15. The revolt of the ten tribes from the house of David was their correction for iniquity, but the constant adherence of the other two to that family, which was a competent support of the royal dignity, perpetuated the mercy of God to the seed of David, according to this promise. Never any other family swayed the sceptre of Judah, than that of David. This is that covenant of royalty celebrated, Ps. 89: 3, &c. as typical of the covenant of redemption and grace.

2. Others of them relate to Christ, who is often called David, and the Son of David: that son of David to whom these promises pointed, and in whom they had their full accomplishment. He was of the seed of David, Acts 13: 23. But the establishing of his house, and his throne, and his kingdom for ever, (v. 13.) and again, and a third time, (v. 16.) for ever, can be applied to no other than Christ and his kingdom. The supposition of committing iniquity, cannot indeed be applied to the Messiah Himself, but it is applicable (and very comfortably) to his spiritual seed; true believers have their infirmities, for which they may expect to be corrected, but they shall not be cast off. Every transgression in the covenant will not throw us out of covenant.

Now, (1.) This message Nathan faithfully delivered to David, v. 17. Though, in forbidding

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. The greater leisure and ability any man is favored with, the more should he form, and attempt to execute, plans of important usefulness; and those who are largely supplied with the providential gifts of God, and at the same time richly replenished by his grace, will most comfortably enjoy their possessions, when they can render them subservient to his glory and the salvation of souls. Such zealous and liberal Christians should be encouraged by their brethren, and by ministers, as far as the great designs they conceive agree with the Scripture.—The wisest and best of men, (not excepting prophets and apostles, unless when immediately speaking by divine inspiration,) have been liable to error; hence the claim of infallibility is the very essence of blasphemous arrogance. But God will rectify the prejudicial mistakes of his upright servants, and prevent every bad consequence: and it is their true honour, as well as their duty, to retract what they have unadvisedly advanced, and to acknowledge themselves mistaken; and all wise men will respect them the more for doing so.—Our desires, even of usefulness, must be subjected to God's holy will, and regulated by his precept. He appoints unto every man his work, and endows him with suitable qualifications: and each of us should thankfully and faithfully mind our proper business; and rejoice in the superior talents, and more honorable and important services, of our brethren.—Our own plans, though well intended, are often fit for nothing but to be laid aside, to make way for the Lord's purposes respecting us, of which perhaps we had no conception. But, in one way or other, God will bless, and make useful to his church, those persons, who simply devote themselves and all they have to his glory.—Israel, according to the flesh, forfeited by their sins the rest to which they were brought: and the cause of God has hitherto been greatly opposed and run down. Yet the time is coming when this cause will gain the entire ascendency, and overspread the earth; and when the Israel of God shall 'be planted, and dwell in a place of their own, and move no more, neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more for ever.'—We should indeed earnestly desire the entail of our blessings on our posterity, that they may be children of God; but our chief comfort in life and death must arise from looking unto Jesus, the Son of God, the everlasting King of Israel, and in participating his covenanted mercies. (Note, 23: 5.) In his human nature 'all the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily;' and by uniting his people to Himself through his Holy Spirit, He builds the living temple, in which the Lord will dwell for ever. If we belong to Him, He will not finally reject us: but when we offend, He will, by rebukes and chastenings, bring us to repentance, and establish us, as kings and priests before Him, to all eternity. (Notes, Heb. 12: 4—8. Rev. 3: 18, 19. 5: 8—10.)

then had, were excluded from the succession.—The kingdom over Judah remained, unto the Babylonish captivity, in the family of David and Solomon.—These promises were, however, in an especial manner, predictions of Christ, the son of David, the true Solomon, 'the Prince of peace,' who builds the spiritual temple of true believers, to be 'an habitation of God through the Spirit.' (Notes, Zech. 6:12,13. Eph. 2:19—22.)—The clause concerning the merciful chastisement of David's son if he offended, and the engagement not to reject him for his transgressions, belongs to his people, who are his seed, and one with him. In a parallel passage, it is put in the plural number, 'If his children forsake my law, &c.' (Ps. 89:30—33.)—The expression, 'before thee,' might perhaps be a gracious intimation, that though these things would take place after David's death, yet he would be acquainted with them, and rejoice in them.

(14.) Dr. A. Clarke transl. . . . 'son: even in his suffering for iniquity, I shall chasten him with the rod of men, (with the rod due to men,) and with the stripes (due to) the children of Adam;' and refers to Is. 53 4,5. See the Diss. of Kennicott, quoted by him at the end of this ch. in which it is remarked, that 'next to our present very improper translation, the cause of the common confusion here has been—not distinguishing the promise here made, as to Messiah alone, from another made as to Solomon alone: one by Nathan, near the beginning, the other by Gad, (so the Arab.) near the end of David's reign.'

him to build the temple, he contradicted his own words, yet he was not backward to do it, when he was better informed concerning the mind of God. (2.) These promises God faithfully performed to David, and his seed, in due time. Though David came short of making good his purpose to build God's house, yet He did not come short of making good his promise to build him a house. Such is the tenor of the covenant we are under; though there are many failures in our performances, there are none in God's.

V. 18—29. We have here David's solemn address to God, in answer to the gracious message God had sent him. David had no sooner received the message, than, while the impressions of it were fresh, he retired to return an answer. Observe,

I. The place he retired to; he went in before the Lord, that is, into the tabernacle, where the ark was. God's will now is, that men pray every where; but wherever we pray, we must set ourselves as before the Lord, and set Him before us.

II. The posture he put himself into; he sat before the Lord. 1. It denotes the posture of his body. But this will by no means justify the ordinary use of that gesture in prayer, whatever may be allowed in a case of necessity. Kneeling or standing is certainly the most proper. David went in, and took his place before the Lord, so it may be read; but when he prayed, he stood up as the manner was. Or, he went in and continued before the Lord; staid some time silently meditating, before he began his prayer, and then remained longer than usual in the tabernacle. Or, 2. It may denote the frame of his spirit at this time. He went in, and composed himself before the Lord; thus we should do in all our approaches to God; O God, my heart is fixed, my heart is fixed.

III. The prayer itself, which is full of the breathings of pious and devout affection toward God.

1. He speaks very humbly of himself, and his own merits. So he begins as one astonished, v. 18. God had reminded him of the meanness of his original, (v. 8.) and he subscribed to it. He was, on all accounts, a very considerable and valuable man; yet he says, when he comes to speak of himself before God, 'Who am I? A man not worth taking notice of.' His house was of the royal tribe, and descended from the prince of that tribe; and allied to the best families of the country, yet, he, like Gideon, thinks his family poor in Judah, and himself the least in his father's house. David thus humbled himself, when Saul's daughter was mentioned to him for a wife, (1 Sam. 18: 18.) but now with much more reason. Note, It very well becomes the greatest and best of men, even in the midst of the highest advancements, to have low and mean thoughts of themselves. For the greatest of men are worms, the best are sinners, and those who are highest advanced, have nothing but what they have received. It intimates, that he could not have reached this himself by his own management, if God had not brought him to it. All our attainments must be looked upon as God's vouchsafements.

2. He speaks very highly and honorably of God's favors to him. Is this the manner of men? That is, 1st. Can man expect to be so dealt with by his Maker? Is this the law of Adam? Note, Considering the character and condition of men, it is very surprising and amazing God should deal with them as He does. Or, 2dly. Do men usually deal thus one with another? No, the way of our God is far above the manner of men. Some give another sense of this, And this is the law of man, the Lord Jehovah: i. e. 'This promise of one whose kingdom shall be established for ever, must be understood of one that is a man, and yet the Lord Jehovah, this must be the law of such a one. A Messiah from my loins must be man, but, reigning for ever, must be God.' 'What can I ask, or wish for more? v. 20. Thou, Lord, knowest thy servant, knowest what will make me happy, and what Thou hast promised is enough to do so.' The promise of Christ includes all; if that Man, the Lord God, be ours, what can we ask, or think of, more? Eph. 3: 20. Then let us be satisfied with the provision He has made for us; what can we say more for ourselves in our prayers, than He has said for us in his promises?

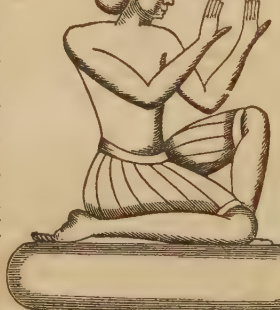
3. He ascribes all to the free grace of God; (v. 21.) both the great things He had done for him, and the great things He had made known to him. All that God does for his people in his providences, and secures to them in his promises, is for his pleasure, and for his praise; the pleasure of his will, and the praise of his word.

4. He adores the greatness and glory of God, v. 22. God's gracious condescension to him, and the honor He had put on him, did not at all abate his awful veneration for the Divine Majesty; the nearer any are brought to God, the more they see of his glory.

5. He expresses great esteem for the Israel of God, v. 23, 24. As there were none among the gods to be compared with Jehovah, so none among the nations to be compared with Israel; considering, (1.) The works He had done for them;

Christ and his spiritual throne alone are they fulfilled. Had David's posterity been faithful, they would, according to these promises of God, have been sitting on the Israelitish throne at the present day.' Kennicott, in Dr. A. CLARKE. The subject is exhibited at full, and in an interesting light, by Dr. J. P. SMITH, in his highly valuable work, 'The Scripture Testimony to the Messiah;' vol. I. pp. 263—272. 2d. ed. ED.

(18.) David cordially acquiesced in the will of God; and likewise found his love, gratitude, hope, and joy greatly excited, by these remembrances of past, and promises of future mercies, to himself, his people, and posterity; especially as they all centred in the promised Savior who was to descend from him. This is the only place in Scripture, which mentions sitting as the posture of any servant of God in religious worship. SCOTT.



Sat] 'Pococke supposes after the manner, inferior persons sit at this day [in the E.] before great men. [See the cut. Ex. 25: 18, with which compare a praying figure from one of the most ancient Egyptian monuments.] It is considered a very humble posture.' WILLIAMS.

(18, 19.) Dr. J. P. Smith reads, 'What am I, O Lord, Jehovah, and what my house, that thou hast brought me to this point [of exaltation]! And little [is] even this in thine eyes, O Lord Jehovah: thou hast even spoken, with respect to the house of thy servant, unto a vast extent! And this [is] the law of the Adam, O Lord Jehovah:' and in the parallel place, 1 Chr. 17:16,17. 'Thou hast regarded me according to the order of the Adam from above, [or, the pre-eminent,] O Jehovah God!' Carpenter, in quoting this, agrees with Dr. A. Clarke, after Kennicott, that this prophecy refers to Christ only. 'Christ was to descend from Abraham: of course the promise of Him is recorded in Abraham's life, Gen. 22:18. Christ being also to descend from David, it cannot be supposed, the historian omitted to record this promise, more honorable to him than any other circumstance, especially when his life is given more at large than that of any other person in the O. T. The record of this promise must be in this ch. if written at all. Here I am fully persuaded it is, and the chief reason why our divines have so frequently missed it, or been so much perplexed about it, is owing to the very improper translation of vs. 10 and 14.' [See notes on those vs. and on 1 Chr. 17:16,17.] Kennicott. On these words, it is the remark of Michaelis, as quoted by Dr. Smith: 'All human affairs are subjected to changes: nothing is permanent: at least reigning families are not. Not one of those which now occupy any of the thrones of Europe (which have been generally more regular and stable than any other) is now 1000 yrs. old. It is plainly, therefore, contrary to the course of all human affairs, that to the family of David an everlasting throne should be promised. In fact, it was not to be brought to pass in the ordinary course of things; but was to be accomplished in that Everlasting King, who is celebrated in the 72d. and 110th. Psalms.' ED.

(19.) Manner of man.] 'Lit. law of Adam. [And so the Sept. Lat. Vulg. and Doway vers.] Does he refer to the promise to Adam "The seed of the woman," &c.? "From my line shall the Messiah spring, and be the spiritual and triumphant King for ever and ever?"' [Thus Luther, Osiander, Pfeiffer, and Gill, who translates, 'this is the law, or doctrine, of the man who is the Lord God.'] Dr. A. CLARKE.

(20, 21.) David could find nothing to ask for himself, or his people, or his posterity, but what had already been covenanted to him: so that his prayer consisted of thankful repetitions of the promises. SCOTT.

like Israel, whom God [e]went to redeem for a people to himself, and to make him a name, and to do for you [f]great things and terrible, for thy land, before [g]thy people, which thou redeemedst to thee from Egypt, from the nations and [h]their gods?

24 For thou hast [k]confirmed to thyself thy people Israel, to be a people unto thee for ever: and thou, LORD, art become their God.

25 And now, O LORD God, the word that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, [m]establish it for ever, and do as thou hast said.

26 And [n]let thy name be magnified for ever, saying, The LORD of hosts is the God over Israel: and let the house of thy servant David be established [o]before thee.

27 For thou, O LORD of hosts, God of Israel, hast [*]revealed to thy servant, saying, [p]I will build thee an house: therefore hath thy servant [q]found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee.

28 And now, O LORD God, thou art that God, and [r]thy words be true, and thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant:

29 Therefore now [†]let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may continue for ever before thee: for thou, O LORD God, hast spoken it, and with thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed [s]for ever.

how He went to redeem them, as if by the same consultation and concurrence of all the persons in the blessed Trinity, that there was when God said, Let Us make man. Whom they that were sent of God, went to redeem; so the Chaldee, meaning, I suppose, Moses and Aaron. The redemption of Israel, as described here, was typical of our redemption by Christ; the honor of God, and the eternal happiness of the saints, are the two things aimed at in their redemption. (2.) The covenant He had made with them, v. 24. [1.] Mutual; 'They to be a people to Thee, and Thou a God to them.' [2.] Immutable; 'Thou hast confirmed them.' He that makes the covenant, makes it sure, and will make it good.

6. He concludes with humble petitions. (1.) He grounds his petitions on the message God had sent him; (v. 27.) Thou hast revealed this to thy servant; i. e. 'Thou hast, of thine own good will, given me the promise, that thou wilt build me a house, else I could never have found in my heart to pray such a prayer as this.' 'Thy servant has found in his heart to pray this prayer;' so it is in the original, and the Sept. That prayer which is found in the tongue only, will not please God; it must be found in the heart; that must be lifted up and poured out before God. My son, give God thy heart. (2.) He builds his faith, and hopes to speed, on the fidelity of God's promise, v. 28. Thou art that God; that Lord of hosts, and God of Israel; or, That God whose words are true, whom one may depend on. (3.) Thence he fetches the matter of his prayer, and refers himself to that, as the guide of his prayers.

[1.] He prays for the performance of his promise, v. 25. Thus we must turn God's promises into prayers, and then they shall be turned into performances.

[2.] He prays for the glorifying of God's name; v. 26. this ought to be the sum and centre of all our prayers; begin with Hallowed be thy name, and end with Thine is the glory for ever. And he reckons, nothing magnifies God's name more than this, to say, with suitable affections, The Lord of hosts is the God over Israel. David desired the performance of God's promise for the honor, not of his own name but of God's. Thus the Son of David prayed, Father, glorify thy name; (John 12: 28.—17: 1.) Glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify Thee.

[3.] He prays for his house; for to that the promise has special reference: The care of good men is very much concerning their families; and the best entail on their families is the blessing of God. The repetition of this request is not a vain repetition. He prays, that the entail of the crown might not be cut off, but remain in his family; that none of his ever forfeit it, but walk before God, and have that for their establishment; and that his kingdom might have its perfection and perpetuity in the kingdom of the Messiah. The perpetuity of the Messiah's kingdom is the desire and faith of all good people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 18—29. When we have duly attended to the word, which the Lord has spoken; and when our affections are excited, or our consciences alarmed; let us without delay retire, to pour out our hearts before Him in fervent prayer, grounded on his gracious promises in Christ Jesus.—Comparing the former displays of the glorious excellences of our God, with those which He has manifested in his dealings with us, we shall at once have our admiring gratitude enlarged, and our expectation of further blessings increased; and shall find in our hearts to plead his precious promises, neither deeming them too large, nor too hard, for Him to perform to us wretched sinners. Though He have not given us 'a great name, like unto the great men that are in the earth;' we shall be contented with 'a name written in the book of life,' and a clear character among our brethren: and we can desire no more for our posterity, than that they may be 'blessed with the blessing of the LORD for ever.' SCOTT.

Verse 26.

The Lord by his promises had connected the glory of his own truth, with the establishment of David's family; and David also expected and desired, that his descendants might be instrumental in maintaining true religion for the glory of God.—In Christ all the perfections of the Godhead are glorified; and by Him the cause of truth and righteousness is, and will be, established on earth. (1 Chr. 29:10—19. Ps. 21:13. 72.17—19. Matt. 6:13.) In all these respects David prayed for the magnifying of God's name, in the establishment of his posterity. (1 Chr. 17.17—24. v. 24.) SCOTT.

Verses 27—29.

(M. R.) The promises of Scripture are not made personally to us by name, as these were to David; but they belong to all who believe in Jesus Christ, and plead them in his name. (2 Pet. 1:3,4.) ID.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. (Note, 1 Chr. 18:1.) Metheg-ammah, or 'the bridle of Ammah,' (marg.) was probably an eminence, or natural fortress, on which Gath was built, and gave the inhabitants an opportunity of retaining the neighborhood in subjection. SCOTT.

Took Metheg-ammah.] 'This is variously transl. The Vulg. (probably, nearest the truth) has, removed the bondage of the tribute which the Israelites paid to the Philistines. No such place as Metheg-ammah is known. [Gill remarks that some make Ammah to be the hill Amgaris of Pliny. ED.] The versions are all different.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 2.

It may be supposed David had just cause for this war, and for the severity with which he treated the vanquished. SCOTT.

'This treatment,' says Michaelis, 'was one third less severe than the Mosaic law commanded.' See on 12:31. ED.

Verse 3.

Zobah seems to have been a part of Syria, to the N. E. of Canaan, to the S. of Damascus, and reaching to the river Euphrates.—It is probable, that Hadadezer was jealous of David's growing greatness, and came to assist the Moabites, in order to secure his own dominhis border, [h] at the river Euphrates.

4 And David took * from him a thousand † chariots, and seven hundred horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen: and [i] David houghed all the chariot-horses, but [k] reserved of them for an hundred chariots.

5 And [l] when the Syrians of Damascus [m] came to succor Hadadezer king of Zobah, David slew of the Syrians two and twenty thousand men.

6 Then David put [n] garrisons in Syria of Damascus: and the Syrians became servants to David, and brought gifts. And [o] the LORD preserved David whithersoever he went.

13 And David [a] got him a name when he returned from ¶ smiting of the Syrians in [b] the valley of salt,  being eighteen thousand men.

14 And he put garrisons in Edom; throughout all Edom put he garrisons: and [c] all they of Edom became David's servants. And [d] the LORD preserved David whithersoever he went.

a vain thing for safety, Ps. 33: 16, 17. 2. The Syrians of Damascus coming to the relief of the king of Zobah, fell with him, v. 5. so that it was easy for David to make himself master of the country, and garrison it for himself, v. 6. The enemies of God's church will, by their confederacies, ruin each other, Isa. 8: 9.

In all these wars David was protected and enriched, (v. 7, 8.) according to the ancient entail of these countries on the seed of Abraham.

V. 9—14. Here is, 1. The court made to David by the king of Hamath, who, it seems, was at this time at war with the king of Zobah. David lost nothing by taking this little prince under his protection; for the wealth he had from the countries he conquered by way of spoil, he had from this by way of present or gratuity: Vessels of silver and gold.

2. The offering David made to God of the spoils of the nations, and all the rich things brought him, v. 11, 12. All were dedicated, i. e. designed for building the temple; a good omen of kindness to the Gentiles in the fulness of time, that the temple was built of the spoils and presents of Gentile nations. In allusion to which, we find the kings of the earth bringing their glory and honor into the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21: 24. Their gods of gold David burnt, (ch. 5: 21.) but their vessels of gold he dedicated; thus, in the conquest of a soul, by the grace of the Son of David, what stands in opposition to God must be destroyed, every lust mortified and crucified, but what may glorify Him must be dedicated, and the property of it altered: even the merchandise and the hire must be holiness to the Lord, (Isa. 23: 18.) the gain consecrated to the Lord of the whole earth, (Mic. 4: 13.) then it is truly our own, and that most comfortably.

3. The reputation he got, particularly by his victory over the Syrians, and the Edomites their allies, compare the title of Ps. 60. penned on this occasion, with v. 13. he gat him a name. Something extraordinary, it is likely, there was in that action, which turned very much to his honor, yet he is careful to transfer the honor to God, as appears by the psalm, v. 12. It is through God, that we do valiantly.

4. His success against the Edomites, v. 14. Now, and not till now, Isaac's blessing was accomplished, (Gen. 27: 37—40.) the Edomites continued long tributaries to the kings of Judah, Syrians.] It is said in Chr. that 'Abishai smote 18,000 Edomites in the valley of salt.' (1 Chr. 18 12.) Perhaps they were Edomites fighting for the Syrians. It is evident, however, that Edom was subjected in consequence of this victory, by which David acquired great renown.—12,000 of Edom are elsewhere mentioned, as slain by Joab. (Ps. 60: title.) Perhaps Joab and Abishai commanded distinct bodies of troops, and 18,000 were slain between them, 6,000 by Abishai, and 12,000 by Joab.—Thus the predictions concerning the Edomites began to be fulfilled. CHAP. IX. The only thing recorded in this ch. is, the kindness David showed to Jonathan's seed for his sake.

V. 1—8. Here is, I. David's inquiry after the remains of the ruined house of Saul, v. 1. This was a great while after his accession to the throne, as the Moabites to the kings of Israel, till, in Joram's time, they revolted, (2 Chr. 21: 8.) as Isaac had foretold Esau should, in process of time, break the yoke from his neck. Thus David, by his conquests, secured peace to his son, that he might have time, and procured wealth, that he might have wherewith to build the temple. God employs his servants variously; and one prepares work for the other, that God may have the glory of all. All David's victories were typical of the success of the Gospel.

V. 15—18. David was not so engaged in wars abroad, as to neglect the administration at home.

1. His care extended to all parts of his dominion. All Israel were safe under his protection, and shared in the fruits of his good government. v. 15.

2. He did justice with an unbiassed, unshaken hand; neither did wrong, nor denied or delayed right to any. It bespeaks his industry, and close application to business; also his impartiality and equity; he never perverted justice for favor or affection, nor had respect of persons, in judgment. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was faithful and true, and who doth in righteousness both judge and make war, Rev. 19: 11. See Ps. 72: 1, 2.

3. He kept good order, and good officers, in his court. Being the first king that had an established government. (Saul's reign [if not short was] unsettled,) he had the modelling of the administration. He instituted (1.) Two military officers; Joab as general of the forces in the field, and Benaiah over the Cherethites and Pelethites, i. e. the city trainbands, archers and slingers, so the Chal. or rather the life-guard, or standing force, that attended the king's person. They were ready to serve at home, to assist in administering justice, and to preserve the public peace: we find them employed in proclaiming Solomon, 1 K. 1: 38. (2.) Two ecclesiastical officers; Zadok and Ahimelech as priests, i. e. to be employed in the priests' work under Abiathar, the high priest. (3.) Two civil officers; one as recorder, or remembrancer, to remind the king of business in its season; he was prime minister of state; another as scribe, or secretary of state, to draw up public orders and despatches, and record judgments given. Lastly, David's sons, as they grew up, had places of honor and trust assigned them, either in the household, the camp, or the courts of justice, according to their genius. They were chief about the king; (so it is explained, 1 Chr. 18: 17.) employed near him, that they might be under his eye. Our Lord Jesus has appointed officers in his kingdom, for his honor and the good of the community, (Eph. 4: 8—11. Mark 13: 44.) David made his sons chief rulers; but all believers are better preferred, Rev. 1: 6.

V. 1—8. Here is, I. David's inquiry after the remains of the ruined house of Saul, v. 1. This was a great while after his accession to the throne, for Mephibosheth, who was but five years old when Saul died, had now a son born, v. 12. It is good sometimes to think, whether there be any promises or engagements that we have neglected to make good; better do it late than never. The compendium Paul gives of the life of David, is, that he served his generation according to the will of God, i. e. made it his business to do good; witness this instance, where we may observe,

1. That he sought an opportunity to do good, v. 1. So good men should. The liberal deviseth liberal things. For the most proper objects of our kindness and charity are such, as will not be frequently found without inquiry. The most necessitous are the least clamorous.

2. Saul had a very numerous family, (1 Chr. 8: 33.) enough to replenish a country, and yet so emptied, that none of it appeared; but it was come to this inquiry, Is there any left? See how the providence of God can empty full families; see how the sin of man will do it! Saul's was a bloody house, no marvel it was thus reduced, ch. 21: 1.

(1.) Saul was David's sworn enemy, yet he would show kindness to his house, and was forward to do it. Note, We must evince the sincerity of our forgiving persons any way unjust or injurious to us, by being ready, as we have opportunity, to show kindness both to them and theirs: not only not avenge ourselves on them, but love them, and do them good, (Mat. 5: 44.) and not be backward to any office of love and good-will to those that have done us many an injury, but contrariwise, blessing. This is the way to overcome evil, and to find mercy for ourselves and ours, when we or they need it.

(2.) Jonathan was David's sworn friend, therefore he would show kindness to his house. This teaches us to be mindful of our covenant, and of our friendships. Note, Kindness to our friends, even to them and theirs, is one of the laws of our holy religion. Prov. 18: 24. Though there be not a solemn league, yet there is a sacred law of friendship, no less obliging, that to him that is in misery pity should be showed by his friend; A brother is born for adversity.

3. The kindness he promised, he calls the kindness of God; not only great kindness, [kindness in the highest degree, as the phrase is often used,] but, kindness, in pursuance of the covenant between him and Jonathan, to which God was a witness: see 1 Sam. 20: 42. kindness, after God's example; for we must be merciful as He is. He spares those whom He has advantage against, and so must we. Jonathan's request was, (1 Sam. 20: 14.) 'Show me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not, and the same to my seed.' The kindness of God, is some greater instance of kindness than one can ordinarily expect from men. It is kindness done after a godly sort, and with an eye to God, and his honor and favor.

II. Ziba was an old retainer to Saul's family, and knew the state of it; he is sent for and examined, and acquaints the king, that Jonathan's son was living, but lame, v. 3. How he came to be so, we read before, (ch. 4: 4.) and that he lived

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Short is the triumphing and certain the ruin of all God's enemies, however strong and confederated. But those who confide in his protection, and are doing his work, will be preserved and prospered, 'whithersoever they go.' They will not allow themselves to glory in their success, or to establish any other ground of confidence, than the mercy, power, and truth of Him who has hitherto helped them, to whom they will dedicate the fruits of their prosperity; and in this they will be distinguished from all the other mighty ones, who have been renowned on the earth.—A diligent, impartial administration of justice, should be the business of those who are advanced above others; for their authority was given them to do good with.—Thus the Son of David subjects his enemies: his Gospel is a savor of life to some, and of death to others; and He will be glorified upon his obstinate opposers, and by those who welcome Him as their Lord and Savior. Many assist in building his spiritual temple, who have no place in it: his government is in judgment and in justice, as well as in mercy: and all who adhere to Him faithfully, in a state of humiliation and suffering, shall reign with Him for ever in glory. SCOTT.

Verses 15—18.

Ahimelech and Zadok presided, probably, the one on mt. Zion, the other at Gibeon, where the tabernacle was. (1 K. 3:4. 1 Chr. 16:37—43.) The Cherethites and Pelethites, probably, consisted chiefly of those, who had accompanied David in his distresses; or of such as had joined him from among the Philistines, who are called Cherethites. (M. R. m.) SCOTT.

(16—18.) Note 1 Sam. 10:25. ED.

(18) 'Cherethites are those who accompanied David when he fled from Saul; Pelethites those who came to him at Ziklag: so some—they were rather archers and slingers. No weapons then known were equally powerful with the bow and sling.' Dr. A. CLARKE. 'Cherethites, from kereth, to cut off, executioners, and Pelethites, from peleih, to run or go swiftly, royal messengers: The two appear to have constituted the kings body-guard, and were like the capigis of Turkey. Executioners in the E. are an honorable body. Comp. Mark 6:27. The Cherethites, or Cretans, are thought to belong to the same nation of Caphtorim, or Philistines, by Calmet.' ROB. CALM.

3 And the king said, Is there not yet any of the house of Saul, that I may show [d] the kindness of God unto him? And Ziba said unto the king, Jonathan hath [e] yet a son, which is lame on his feet.

4 And the king said unto him, Where is he? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold he is in the house of [f] Machir, the son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar.

5 Then king David sent, and fetched him out of the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel, from Lo-debar.

6 Now when [g] Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, the son of Saul, was come unto David, [h] he fell on his face, and did reverence. And David said, Mephibosheth. And he answered, Behold thy servant.

7 And David said unto him, [i] Fear not: [j] for I will surely show thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father; and thou shalt [k] eat bread at my table continually.

8 And he bowed himself, and said, What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such [l] a dead dog as I am?

9 Then the king called to Ziba, Saul's servant, and said unto him, [m] I have given unto thy master's son all that pertained to Saul, and to all his house.

10 Thou therefore, and thy sons, and thy servants, shall till the land for him, and thou shalt bring in the fruits, that thy master's son may have food to eat: but Mephibosheth thy master's son [n] shall eat bread alway at my table. [o] Now Ziba had fifteen sons and twenty servants.

11 Then said Ziba unto the king, [p] According to all that my lord the king hath commanded his servant, so shall thy servant do. As for Mephibosheth, said the king, he shall eat at my table, as one of the king's sons.

12 And Mephibosheth had a young [q] son, whose name was Micha: and all that dwelt in the house of Ziba were [r] servants unto Mephibosheth.

13 So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem: for [s] he did eat continually at the king's table; and was lame on both his feet.

OBSCURE, probably, among his mother's relations in Lo-debar, in Gilead, on the other side Jordan.

III. The bringing of Mephibosheth to court. The king sent (Ziba, it is likely) to bring him up to Jerusalem with all convenient speed, v. 5. Machir appears to have been a very generous, free-hearted man, and to have entertained Mephibosheth, not out of disaffection to David, but in compassion to the reduced son of a prince, for afterward we find him kind to David himself, when he fled from Absalom (ch. 17: 27.); though when David sent for Mephibosheth from him, he little thought the time would come, when he himself would gladly be beholden to him: therefore we should be forward to give, because we know not but we ourselves may sometime be in want; he that watereth, shall be watered also himself.

Now, 1. Mephibosheth presents himself to David with all the respect due to his character, v. 6. David had thus made his honors to Mephibosheth's father, Jonathan, when next the throne; (1 Sam. 20: 41.) and now Mephibosheth, in like manner, addresses him, when affairs are so completely reversed. Those who, when in inferior relations, show respect, when they come to be advanced, shall have respect shown them.

2. David received him with all kindness. He remembered his name; probably he was born about the time of the intimacy between him and Jonathan. He bade him not be afraid, v. 7. Great men should not take a pleasure in the timorous approaches of their inferiors, but encourage them. He gives him, by grant from the crown, all the land of Saul his father, i. e. his paternal estate: forfeited by Ish-bosheth's rebellion, and added to his own revenue. True friendship will be generous. For Jonathan's sake, he will make him a constant guest at his own table: for his good father's sake, will take him to be one of his family.

3. Mephibosheth accepts this kindness with great humility and self-abasement. He was none of those that take every favor as a debt, and think every thing too little that their friends do for them, v. 8. How does he vilify himself! Though the son of a prince, and the grandson of a king, yet, his family being under guilt and wrath, and himself poor and lame, he calls himself a dead dog before David. Note, It is good to have the heart humble under humbling providences, and those who thus humble themselves, shall be exalted. How does he magnify David's kindness! It had been easy to lessen it, had he been so disposed. Had David restored him his father's estate, it was but giving him his own. Did he take him to his table? That was policy, that he might have an eye on him. But Mephibosheth thinks all kind, that David said and did, and himself less than the least of his favors. See 1 Sam. 18: 18.

V. 9—13. The matter is here settled concerning Mephibosheth.

1. This grant of his father's estate is confirmed to him, and Ziba called as a witness; (v. 9.) it should seem, Saul had a very good estate, 1 Sam. 9: 1. 22: 7.

2. The management of the estate is committed to Ziba, who knew what it was, and how to make the most of it, whom, having been his father's servant, he might confide in, and who, having a numerous family of sons and servants, had hands sufficient to be employed about it, v. 10. Thus Mephibosheth is made very easy, having a good estate without care, and is in a fair way of being very rich; having much coming in, and little occasion to spend, himself being kept at David's table. Ziba, too, is now pleased, for he loves wealth, and will have abundance: v. 11. seems to be Ziba's words. How unfaithful Ziba was, we shall find at ch. 16: 3.

David being a type of Christ, his kindness to Mephibosheth may illustrate the kindness and love of God our Savior toward fallen man. Man was convicted of rebellion against God, and, like Saul's house, under sentence of rejection from

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Amidst a multiplicity of affairs, we are prone to forget the gratitude we owe, and the engagements we are under, not only to our friends, but to the Lord Himself: but persons of real and eminent piety, when they recollect their obligations, will have no rest till they have discharged them: they will be burdened with those possessions, which they suppose in equity belong to another; and impatient to express their forgiveness of those by whom they have been injured, and their gratitude to the persons or the relations of those who have been kind to them.—Those who have much in their power should sedulously inquire after opportunities of doing good; for frequently the most deserving objects of our compassion are concealed by modesty and patient resignation.—Kindness, shown to the most helpless persons, is sometimes recompensed in a very seasonable manner, by those from whom we had no expectation of obtaining or wanting assistance.—To be trained up in privacy, poverty, and hardship, and afterwards more prospered, is far more comfortable, than to be brought up in pride and delicacy, with great expectations, and then to be reduced to poverty and distress. Though the liberality of friends should be thankfully acknowledged, it can contribute little to our real happiness, further than providing us with the necessaries or conveniences of life. But the love of Jesus, who seeks out, provides for, enriches, and entertains us poor, ruined, worthless sinners, confers substantial and enduring felicity. May we humbly acknowledge our unworthiness of his mercies, thankfully accept them, and return Him our cheerful praises and willing services, and show our gratitude to Him, by kindness to those whom He owns, as his 'brethren, sisters, and mother.' SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 8, A dead dog.] (M. R. l.) That is, a person who is very mean, and incapable of being any way serviceable. Mephibosheth seems to have been an unambitious, modest, friendly, and pious man. SCOTT.

Verses 9—11.

David appears more generous than prudent in this appointment [of Ziba.] Mephibosheth's family must be provided for out of the estate, though he himself lived at David's table.—Some understand the last clause, as the words of Ziba, proposing in a boasting manner to entertain Mephibosheth royally at his own table: but they seem to be the words of David. CHAP. X.

David sends ambassadors to comfort Hanun, the king of Ammon, on the death of his father; who grossly insults them, 1—4. David counsels and comforts them, 5. The Ammonites, assisted by the Syrians, are overcome by Joab and Abishai, 6—14. Hadarezer sends another army, which David conquers, slaying Shobach its general, 15—18. The kings of Syria submit to David, 19.

AND it came to pass after this, that the [a] king of the children of Ammon died, and Hanun his son reigned in his stead.

2 Then said David, I will [b] show kindness unto Hanun the son of Nahash, [c] as his father showed kindness unto me. And David sent to comfort him, by the hand of his servants, for his father. And David's servants came into the land of the children of Ammon.

3 And the princes of the children of Ammon said unto Hanun their lord, [*] Thinkest thou that David doth honor thy father, that he hath sent comforters unto thee? [d] hath not David rather sent his servants unto thee, to search the city, and to spy it out, and to overthrow it?

4 Wherefore Hanun took David's servants, [e] and shaved off the one half of their beards, and [f] cut off their garments in the middle, even to their buttocks, and sent them away.

5 When they told it unto David, he sent to meet them, because the men were greatly ashamed: and the king said, Tarry at [g] Jericho until your beards be grown, and then return.

6 And when the children of Ammon saw that they [h] stank before David, the children of Ammon sent and hired [i] the Syrians of Beth-rehob, and the Syrians of Zoba, twenty thousand footmen, and of king [k] Maacah a thousand men, and of [†] Ish-tob twelve thousand men.

7 And when David heard of it, he sent Joab, and [l] all the host of the mighty men.

8 And the children of Ammon came out, and put the battle in array at the entering in of the gate: and the Syrians of Zoba, and of [m] Rehob, and Ish-tob, and Maacah, were by themselves in the field.

9 When Joab saw that [n] the front of the battle was against him before and behind, he chose of all the choice men of Israel, and put them in array against the Syrians.

10 And the rest of the people he delivered into the hand of Abishai his brother, that he might put them in array against the children of Ammon.

11 And he said, [o] If

Chap. X. This ch. tells of a war David had with the Ammonites, and the Syrians their allies, with the occasion and success of it.

V. 1—5. Here is, I. The great respect David paid his neighbor, the king of the Ammonites; v. 1, 2. for some kindnesses formerly received from Nahash, the deceased king, v. 2. The pleasure of doing one kind and generous action, should excite us to another. Nahash had been a cruel enemy to Israel, (1 Sam. 11: 2.) and had showed kindness to David, perhaps only in contradiction to Saul: however, David is not nice in examining the grounds and principles of it, but resolves gratefully to return it. He sends an embassy to condole with him on his father's death, as is common among princes in alliance. Note, it is a comfort to children, when their parents are dead, to find that their parents' friends are theirs, and intend to keep up their acquaintance. It is a comfort to mourners, to find there are those who mourn with them, are sensible of their loss, and share in it. It is a comfort to those who are honoring the memory of their deceased relations, to find others who likewise honor it, and value those they valued.

II. Hanun hearkened to the spiteful suggestions of his princes, who insinuated that David's ambassadors, under pretence of being comforters, were sent as spies, v. 3. False themselves, they imagined David dissembled, to serve a turn. Ill-founded suspicion argues a bad mind. Patrick's note on this, is, that there is nothing so well meant, but it may be ill-interpreted, and is wont to be by men who love nobody but themselves. Men of the greatest honor and virtue must not think it strange, if they be thus misrepresented. Charity thinketh no evil: but it is plain, Hanun only sought an occasion to put the utmost disgrace he could on David's ambassadors, (v. 4.) out of an antipathy to their king and country.

III. David's tender concern for his servants thus abused. He sent to meet them, and directed them to stay at Jericho, a private place, where they would not have occasion to come into company, till that half of their beards, which was shaved off, was grown to such a length that the other half might be decently cut to it, v. 5. The Jews wore their beards long, reckoning it an honor to appear aged and grave; therefore it was not fit persons of their rank and figure should appear at court unlike their neighbors. Let us learn not to lay too much to heart unjust reproaches; after a while, they will wear off of themselves, and turn only to the shame of their authors, while the injured reputation in a little time grows again. God will bring forth thy righteousness as the light, therefore wait patiently for Him, Ps. 37: 6, 7.

Some have thought David but well enough served for courting and complimenting that pagan prince, whom he knew to be an inveterate enemy to Israel, and might now remember how, when he [or, as some think, his father,] would have put out the right eye of the men of Jabesh-gilead, he designed that, as he did this, for a reproach on all Israel, 1 Sam. 11: 2. What better usage could he expect from such a spiteful family and people? Why should he covet the friendship of a people, which Israel must have so little to do with, as that an Ammonite might not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation, Deut. 23: 3.

V. 6—14. Here is, I. The preparation the Ammonites make for war, v. 6. They saw they had made themselves very odious to David, and obnoxious to his just displeasure. Yet, it seems, they had not considered how unable they were to meet him; for, now they were forced to hire forces of other nations into their service. Thus sinners daringly provoke God, and expose themselves to his wrath, and never consider that He is stronger than they, 1 Cor. 10:22.

II. The speedy descent David's forces made on them, v. 7. They that are in war with the Son of David, not only give the provocation, but begin the war; for He waits to be gracious, but they strengthen themselves against Him, and therefore, if they turn not, He will whet his sword, Ps. 7: 12. It was David's prudence to carry the war into their own country, and fight them at the entering in of the gate of their capital city, Rabbah, as some think, or Medeba, a city in their borders, before which they pitched to guard their coast, 1 Chr. 19: 7. Such are the terrors and desolations of Chap. X. V. 2. It may be questioned, whether David ought to have shown respect to the memory of so cruel an enemy to his people; especially as the law forbade Israel to seek the peace and prosperity of the Ammonites. (Notes, Deut. 23:3—6. 1 Sam. 11:1—3.) They were not, however, of the devoted nations; so that, perhaps, it was not wrong for David to express a sense of gratitude to a benefactor, without deciding on the motives of his conduct; and to render the customary civilities to his son, on his decease. Scott.

NOTES.

14 And when the children of Ammon saw that the Syrians were fled, then fled they also before Abishai, and entered into the city. So Joab returned from the children of Ammon, and came to Jerusalem.

15 ¶ And when the Syrians saw that they were smitten before Israel, they [t] gathered themselves together.

16 And [u] Hadarezer sent, and brought out the Syrians that were beyond * the river; and they came to Helam: and ‡ Shobach the captain of the host of Hadarezer went before them.

17 And when it was told David, [x] he gathered all Israel together, and passed over Jordan, and came to Helam: and the Syrians set themselves in array against David, and fought with him.

18 And the Syrians [y] fled before Israel; and David slew the men of seven hundred chariots of the Syrians, and forty thousand [z] horsemen, and smote [a] Shobach the captain of their host, who died there.

19 And when all the kings that were [b] servants to Hadarezer saw that they were smitten before Israel, they made peace with Israel, and served them. So the Syrians [c] feared to help the children of Ammon any more.

III. Preparations made for an engagement. 1. The enemy disposed themselves in two bodies, one of Ammonites, which, being their own, were posted at the gate of the city; the other of Syrians, whom they had taken into their pay, and who were therefore posted at a distance in the field, to charge the forces of Israel in the flank or rear, while the Ammonites charged them in the front, v. 8. 2. Joab accordingly divided his forces: the choicest men he took under his own command, to fight the Syrians, whom, probably, he knew to be the better soldiers, and, being hired, better versed in the art of war, v. 9. The rest he put under the command of Abishai, to engage the Ammonites, v. 10.

IV. Joab's speech before the battle, v. 11, 12. It is not long, but pertinent and brave, [indeed, says Clarke, one of the most admirable of ancient or modern times.] 1. He prudently concerts the matter with Abishai his brother, that the dividing of the forces might not be the weakening of them; but that, which part soever was borne hard upon, the other should come in to its assistance. Note, Mutual helpfulness is brotherly duty. Christ's soldiers should thus strengthen one another's hands in their spiritual warfare. They that through grace are conquerors over temptation, must counsel, and comfort, and pray for, those that are tempted: When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. 2. He bravely encourages himself, and his brother, and the rest of the officers and soldiers, to do their utmost. Great dangers put an edge on true courage, and God and our country, was the word. The relation which any person or thing stands in to God, should endear it to us, and engage us to do our utmost in its service. 3. He piously leaves the issue with God. When we make conscience of doing our duty, we may, with the greatest satisfaction, leave the event with God; not thinking that our valor bids Him to prosper us, but that still He may do as He pleases, yet hoping for his salvation in his own way and time.

V. The victory, v. 13, 14. We do not hinder our success by preparing for disappointment.

V. 15—19. Here is, 1. A new attempt of the Syrians to recover their lost honor, and to check the progress of David's victorious arms. The forces lately dispersed, rallied again, v. 15. Even the baffled cause will make head, as long as there is any life in it; the enemies of the Son of David do so, Matt. 23: 34. Rev. 19: 19. These, conscious of insufficiency, called in the aid of their allies and dependences on the other side the river, (v. 16.) and, thus recruited, hoped to make their part good against Israel; but they knew not the thoughts of the Lord, for He gathered them as sheaves into the floor; see Mic. 4: 11—13.

2. The defeat of this attempt by the vigilance and valor of David, who, on notice of their design, resolved not to stay till they attacked him, but went in person at the head of his army over Jordan, (v. 17.) and in a pitched battle routed the Syrians; (v. 18.) slew 7000 men, who belonged to 700 chariots, and 40,000 other soldiers, horse and foot, as appears from 1 Chr. 19: 18. Their general was killed in the battle, and David came home in triumph, no doubt.

3. The consequence of this victory. (1.) David gained several tributaries, v. 19 Thus the promise made to Abraham, (Gen. 15: 18.) and repeated to Joshua, (ch. 1: 4.) that the borders of Israel should extend to the Euphrates, was performed at length. (2.) The Ammonites lost their old allies. The Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon, not because they had an unrighteous cause, (justifying a crime which was a breach of the law of nations,) but because they found it unsuccessful. It is dangerous helping those that have God against them; for when they fall, their helpers will fall with them.

Jesus Christ, the Son of David, sent his apostles and ministers, after all his servants the prophets, to the Jewish church and nation: but they treated them shamefully, as Hanun did David's ambassadors; mocked them, abused them, slew them: and this was it that filled the measure of their iniquity, and brought on them ruin without remedy; (Matt. 21: 35, 41.—22: 7. comp. 2 Chr. 36: 16.) for Christ takes the affronts and injuries done to his ministers, as done to Himself, and will avenge them accordingly.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to sympathize with the afflicted, and show gratitude to our friends: but nothing, except vexation and disappointment, can be expected by courting the friendship of ungodly men.—It is the height of folly to awaken the resentment of those, by insult and contempt, whose power of taking vengeance cannot be thus diminished: and the fatal effects of rash affronts, though little feared, are often severely felt.—Those, who are the most ready to commit injustice, are commonly the most averse to reconciliation: and confidence in numbers, strength, or valor, frequently buoys up men to their destruction; for 'though hand join in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished.' Yet a good cause, and a single dependence on the Lord, afford the surest indications of success.—But especially let the impenitent, and unbelieving, and disobedient recollect, that the Son of David will assuredly resent their contempt of his ambassadors, whom He sends to them with a message of peace and love; and that He will consider the ill-usage of them as a declaration of war against Himself. All his people should be valiant in his cause, and for his truth and righteousness: and ministers should neither fear, nor be ashamed, to exercise their embassy of reconciliation, however despised, insulted, or persecuted; for He will plead their cause, comfort them under their trials, and reward their faithfulness with 'a crown of glory which fadeth not away.' SCOTT.

Is this explained by the custom of some tribes of N. American Indians, who go to war with a limited number of horses: each Indian riding in turn; thus hastening the march. Were the horses and chariots of the Syrians thus apportioned, each one to so many men?] Or some were foot-soldiers and some horsemen. SCOTT. 700.] 'The Hebrews formerly, probably, (as they do now,) expressed their numbers by letters, and, as many of these closely resemble each other, they might in transcribing be easily mistaken one for the other; and thus the two numbers often, as here, become uncertain. Thus, 1 Chr. 19:18. the number stated as slain is 7000. Now the letter Zain with a dot over it (ז) stands for 7000, and the letter Nun (נ) for 700.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

CHAP. XI.

Joab besieges Rabbah, 1. David commits adultery with Bath-sheba, the wife of Uriah, 2—4. She informs David, that she is pregnant, 5; who sends for Uriah, and in vain tries to induce him to visit his wife, 6—13. He sends by Uriah a letter to Joab; according to which Uriah, with others, is slain by the Ammonites, 14—17. Joab sends word to David, and he answers the messengers in very improper language, 18—25. David marries Bath sheba, who bears him a son; but God is displeased, 26, 27.

AND it came to pass, * after the year [a] was expired, at the time when kings go forth to battle, that [b] David sent Joab and his servants with him, and all Israel; and they destroyed the children of Ammon, and besieged [c] Rabbah: but David tarried still at Jerusalem.

2 And it came to pass in an evening-tide, that David [d] arose from off his bed, and walked upon [e] the roof of the king's house: and from the roof [f] he saw a woman washing herself; and the woman was [g] very beautiful to look upon.

3 And David [h] sent and inquired after the woman. And one said, Is not this †Bath-sheba, the daughter of ‡ Eliam, the wife of [i] Uriah the Hittite?

4 And David [k] sent messengers, and took her: and she came in unto him, and [l] he lay with her, (for § she was [m] purified from her uncleanness,) and she returned unto her house.

5 And the woman conceived, and sent and told David, and said, [n] I am with child.

6 And David sent to Joab, saying, [o] Send me Uriah the Hittite. And Joab sent Uriah to David.

7 And when Uriah was come unto him, David demanded of him ‖ how Joab did, and how the people did, and how the war prospered.

8 And David said to Uriah, [p] Go down to thy house, and [q] wash thy feet. And Uriah departed out of the king's house, and [r] there ¶ followed him [s] a mess of meat from the king.

CHAP. XI. What David said of the mournful report of Saul's death, may more fitly be applied to the sad story of this ch. the adultery and murder David was guilty of—Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in Askelon. We wish we could draw a veil over it, and that it might never be known; but it cannot, must not, be concealed: the Scripture is faithful in relating the faults even of those whom it most applauds, which is an instance of the sincerity of the penmen, and an evidence that it was not written to serve any party; but for our learning, that he that thinks he stands, may take heed lest he fall; and that others' harms may be our warnings. Many, no doubt, have been imboldened to sin, and hardened in it, by this story, and to them it is a savor of death unto death; but many have by it been awakened to a holy jealousy over themselves, and constant watchfulness against sin, and to them it is a savor of life unto life. They are very great sins, and greatly aggravated, which here we find David guilty of. Let him that readeth, understand what the best of men are, when God leaves them to themselves.

V. 1—5. Here is, I. David's glory in pursuing the war against the Ammonites, v. 1. Having routed their army in the field, as soon as the season permitted, he sent more forces to waste the country, and further to avenge the quarrel of his ambassadors. Rabbah, their metropolis, held out a great while; Joab laid close siege to it, and it was at the time of that siege, that David fell into this sin.

II. David's shame, in being himself conquered, and led captive, by his own lust. The sin he was guilty of, was adultery, an iniquity to be punished by the judges, a sin which takes away the heart, and gets a man a wound and dishonor, more than any other, and the reproach of it is not wiped away.

1. Observe the occasions, which led to it. (1.) Neglect of his business. To the Syrian war David went in person, ch. 10: 17. Had he been now at his post, at the head of his forces, he had been out of the way of this temptation. When out of the way of duty, we are in temptation. (2.) Love of ease, and indulgence of sloth. He came off his bed at evening-tide; (v. 2.) there he had dozed away the afternoon in idleness, which he should have spent in some exercise, for his own improvement, or the good of others. He used to pray, morning, evening, and at noon, in the day of his trouble: it is to be feared he had, this noon, omitted it. Idleness gives great advantage to the tempter. Standing waters gather filth. The bed of sloth oft proves the bed of lust. (3.) A wandering eye. He saw a woman washing herself, probably from some ceremonial pollution, according to the law. This sin came in at the eye, as Eve's did. Either he had not, like Job, made a covenant with his eyes, or, at this time, had forgotten it.

2. The steps of the sin. When he saw her, lust immediately conceived, and, the corrupt desire growing more violent, though he was told she was a wife, and whose wife she was, yet he sent for her, and when she came, lay with her, she too easily consenting, because he was a great man, and famed for goodness too. See how the way of sin is down-hill; when men begin to do evil, they cannot soon stop themselves. The beginning of lust, as of strife, is like the letting forth of water; therefore leave it off before it be meddled with. The foolish fly fires her wings, and fools away her life, at last, by playing about the candle.

3. The aggravations of the sin. He was now in years, 50 at least, some think more, when those lusts, which are more properly youthful, one would think, should not have been violent in him. He had many wives and concubines; this is insisted on, ch. 12: 8. Uriah, whom he wronged, was one of his own worthies; a person of honor and virtue, now abroad in his service, jeoparding his life for the honor and safety of him and his kingdom, where he himself should have been. Bath-sheba was a lady of good reputation, and, till drawn by him into this wickedness, no doubt, had preserved her purity. David was a king, whom God had intrusted with the sword of justice, and the execution of the law on other criminals, particularly on adulterers, who were, by the law, to be put to death; for him therefore to be guilty of those crimes himself, was to make himself a pattern, when he should have been a terror, to evil doers. Much more might be said to aggravate the sin; and I can think but of one extenuation, that it was done but once, and by the surprise of a temptation. David was none of those, of whom the prophet complains, Jer. 5: 8. but, this once, God left him to himself, as He did Hezekiah, that he might know what was in his heart, 2 Chr. 32: 31. By this instance we are taught, what need we have to pray every day, Father in heaven, lead us not into temptation; and to watch, that we enter not into it.

V. 6—13. Uriah, we may suppose, had now been absent some weeks, and not intending to return till the end of the campaign: the situation of his wife would bring to light the hidden works of darkness; and when, at his return, he should find how he had been abused, and by whom, it might well be expected, he would prosecute his wife, and have her stoned; for jealousy is the rage of a man, especially a man of honor; and he that is

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—5. Without doubt, David's prosperity had gradually rendered him more negligent than formerly in his devotional exercises, and more self-indulgent; and perhaps had occasioned a measure of self-confidence and carnal security: and, having been accustomed, without censure, to marry any single woman, for whom he conceived an affection, his inclinations had not been habituated to a denial. Perhaps, supposing her not to be a married woman, he sent to inquire after her, in order to add her to the number of his wives. But his sinful passion had acquired such an ascendency, that he was the more inflamed by being informed, that she was the wife of one of his bravest and most faithful officers. Most of the Jewish writers, on the most frivolous pretences, exculpate both David and Bath-sheba, as to the adultery; and only condemn David, as to the murder! This is a specimen of their morality! SCOTT.

(2.) 'The Persian ladies regard the bath as their place of greatest amusement; they make appointments to meet there, and often pass 7 or 8 hours together in the carpeted saloon, relating anecdotes, eating sweetmeats, sharing the kalioun (a kind of pipes) and completing, in their beautiful forms, the fancied perfections of the east. . . . The summer bath seemed to comprise every thing of seclusion, elegance, and that luxurious enjoyment which has too often been the chief occupation of some Asiatic princes. This bath, saloon, or court, is circular, with a vast circular basin in its centre, (of pure white marble, 60 or 70 ft. in diameter,) filled with the clearest water, sparkling in the sun, for its only canopy is the vault of heaven; but rose-trees, with other pendant shrubs, bearing flowers, cluster near it. . . . Round the sides of the court are two ranges, one above another, of little chambers, looking towards the bath, and furnished with every refinement of the harem. . . . In this delightful recess, the waters flow through the basin by a constant spring, thus renewing the vigor of the body by their bracing coolness: and enchantingly refreshing the air. . . . The royal master frequently takes his noon-day repose in one of the upper chambers, which encircle the saloons of the bath, and may overlook the bathers below. In such a bath court, probably, Bath-sheba was seen by David, as he was walking at eventide on the roof of his palace; he might undesignedly have strolled far enough to overlook the anderoon of his women, where the beautiful wife of Uriah, visiting the royal wives, might have joined them, as was often the custom of those countries, in the delights of the bath.' PORTER.

9 But [t] Uriah slept at the door of the king's house with all the servants of his lord, and went not down to his house.

10 And when they had told David, saying, Uriah went not down unto his house, David said unto Uriah, Camest not thou from thy journey? why then didst thou not go down unto thine house?

11 And Uriah said unto David, [u] The ark, and Israel, and Judah, abide in tents; and [x] my lord Joab, and the servants of my lord, are encamped in the open fields: shall I then go into mine house to eat, and to drink, and to lie with my wife? [y] as thou livest, and as thy soul liveth, I will not do this thing.

12 And David said to Uriah, [z] Tarry here to-day also, and to-morrow I will let thee depart. So Uriah abode in Jerusalem that day and the morrow.

13 And when David had called him, he did eat and drink before him; and he [a] made him drunk: and at even he went out to lie on his bed with the servants of his lord, but went not down to his house.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ And it came to pass in the morning, that t Job 5:12—14. Prov. 21:30.

thus injured, will not spare in the day of vengeance. This Bath-sheba was apprehensive of, when she let David know she was with child, intimating that he was concerned to protect her, which, it is likely, if he had not promised so to do, she would not have consented to him. Hope of impunity is a great encouragement to iniquity. It might also be expected that Uriah, since he could not prosecute David by law for such an offence, would take his revenge another way, and raise a rebellion. There have been instances of kings, who, by such provocations, given to powerful subjects, have lost their crowns.

To prevent this double mischief, David endeavors to father the child which should be born, on Uriah himself, and therefore sends for him home, to stay a night or two in his own house. Uriah must come home, under pretence of bringing David word how the war prospered, and how they went on with the siege of Rabbah, v. 7. David, having had as much conference with Uriah as he thought requisite to cover the design, sent him to his house, and, that he might be the more pleasant there, sent a dish of meat for himself and wife, v. 8. When that project failed the first night, the next night, he made him drunk, (v. 13.) or merry, that he might forget his vow, (v. 11.) and be disposed to go home to his own bed. It is a very wicked thing, on any design whatsoever, to make a person drunk; Wo to him that doth so, Hab. 2: 15, 16. God will put into their hands a cup of trembling, who put into the hands of others the cup of drunkenness. Robbing a man of his reason, is worse than robbing him of his money; and drawing him into sin, worse than drawing him into any trouble whatsoever. Every good man, especially every magistrate, should endeavor to prevent this sin, by admonishing, restraining, and denying the glass to those whom they see falling into excess; but to further it, is to do the devil's work, to officiate as factor for him.

This plot was defeated by Uriah's firm resolution not to lie in his own bed: both nights, he slept with the life-guard, and went not down to his house, though, probably, his wife pressed him as much as David, v. 9, 12. Now, 1. Some think he suspected what was done; but if he had, surely he would have opened the letter David sent by him to Joab. Whether he suspected any thing or no, Providence put this resolution into his heart, and kept him to it, to discover David's sin, baffle his design to conceal it, and awaken David's conscience to confess, and repent. 3. The reason he gave to David of this strange instance of self-denial and mortification, was very brave, v. 11. Now, (1.) This was a generous resolution, and shows Uriah to be a man of a public spirit, bold and hardy, and mortified to the delights of sense. In times of public difficulty and danger, it does not become us to repose in security, or roll in pleasure; or, do as the king and Haman, who sat down to drink, when the city Shushan was perplexed. We should voluntarily endure hardness, when the church of God is constrained to. (2.) It might have been of use to awaken David's conscience. That he had basely abused so brave a man, a man so heartily concerned for him and his kingdom, and that acted for him and it with so much vigor. That he was himself so unlike him. The consideration of the public hardships and hazards kept Uriah from lawful pleasures, yet could not keep David, though more nearly interested, from unlawful ones. The law was, When the host goeth forth, then, in a special manner, keep thyself from every wicked thing, Deut. 23: 9. Uriah outdid that law, but David violated it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. A deep conviction that the human heart, even the heart of every man, is 'deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked,' is of the greatest importance to the due exercise of repentance, faith, and every Christian grace: and in order to impress this humiliating conviction on the minds of those who attend to the Word of God, a few of his most eminent servants have been left to fall in such a manner, as fully to prove, that every evil dwells in each of us; and that in circumstances of concurring temptations, we are capable of committing any crime; even that which we at present and habitually most dread and detest! Neither eminent piety, nor a long and close walk with God, habits of obedience, and of the government of the passions, nor the sobriety of advancing age, nor peculiar obligations from God, great reputation and usefulness, nor clear knowledge of the divine law; nor even the Spirit of prophecy, have been found capable of extirpating the most hateful propensities of the human heart: though restrained, dethroned, and crucified, they have still lived, and have revived, obtained advantages, and for a season seemed to reign with the most destructive tyranny! Who then are we, that we should deem ourselves secure? We are never in this world out of the reach of temptation; never exempted, in respect of any sin, from the necessity of watchfulness, prayer, and dependence on divine grace. Let us not then be high-minded; but beg of God that He would enable us to pass the time of our sojourning in humble, jealous fear. SCOTT.

Verse 9.

Slept at the door.] 'The general method of building, both in Barbary and the Levant, seems to have continued the same from the earliest ages. Large doors, spacious chambers, marble pavements, cloistered courts, with fountains sometimes playing in the midst, are well adapted to their hot climate. Their jealousy is pleased to have all the windows open into their respective courts, except a latticed window, or balcony, which sometimes looks into the street. Entering one of the principal houses, we first pass through a porch or gateway, with benches on each side, where the master of the family receives visits, and despatches business; [here Uriah seems to have slept;] few persons, not even the nearest relations, having a further admission, except upon extraordinary occasions. From this we are received into the court or quadrangle, open to the weather, and paved with marble to carry off the water. [See the cut.] This is allotted to the reception of larger companies, Luke 5:19, &c.' SHAW. See Calm. by Roo. ED.

Verses 10, 11.

The circumstance of the ark being constantly placed in a tabernacle, and not a temple, could be no reason why Uriah should not go home to his house. It is therefore probable, that the ark was on this occasion carried with the army to the war. SCOTT.

Verses 14—17.

Satan, having gradually drawn David on into one sinful attempt after another, had prepared his mind for still more atrocious wickedness. (Matt. 26:14—16, 25, 30—35, 40, 41, 69—75. John 12:1—8. 13:18—30.) Whatever casuistry David might use with his conscience, this was deliberate murder of many persons with malice prepense, aggravated exceedingly by the circumstance, that these men were slain in the very act of fighting for him and his kingdom. ID.

(14.) To show how well, alas! David here acts the oriental despot, comp. the following; 'Nour Jehan, or 'the light of the world,' (also called Nour Mahl, or 'the light of the seraglio,') was wife to one Sher Afkan Khan, of a Turkoman family, who came from Persia to Hindostan in very indifferent circumstances. As she was exquisitely beautiful, of great wit, and an elegant poetess, Jehanguire, the Sultan, resolved to take her to himself. He sent her husband, esteemed the David [b] wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah.

15 And he wrote in the letter, saying, [c] Set ye Uriah in the forefront of the * hottest battle, and retire ye † from him, that he may be smitten, [d] and die.

16 And it came to pass, when Joab observed the city, that * he assigned Uriah unto a place, where he knew that valiant men were.

17 And the men of the city went out and fought with Joab: and [f] there fell some of the people of the servants of David; and Uriah the Hittite died also.

18 Then Joab sent, and told David all the things concerning the war;

19 And charged the messenger, saying, When thou hast made an end of telling the matters of the war unto the king;

20 And if so be that the king's wrath arise, and he say unto thee, Wherefore approached ye so nigh unto the city when ye did fight? knew ye not that they would shoot from the wall?

21 Who smote [g] Abimelech the son of [h] Jerubbesheth? did not a woman cast a piece of a mill-stone upon him from the wall, that he died in Thebez? why went ye nigh the wall? Then say thou, [i] Thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also.

22 So the messenger went, and came and showed David all that Joab had sent him for.

23 And the messenger said unto David, Surely the men prevailed against us, and came out unto us into the field, and we were upon them even unto the entering of the gate.

24 And the shooters shot from off the wall upon thy servants, and some of the king's servants be dead, and thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also.

25 Then David said unto the messenger, Thus shalt thou say unto Joab, Let not this thing ‡ displease thee; [k] for the sword devoureth § one as well as another: [l] make thy battle more strong against the city, and overthrow it; and encourage thou him.

26 And when the wife of Uriah heard that Uriah her husband was dead, [m] she mourned for her husband.

Verse 21.

Then say, &c.] This was a plain intimation to the messenger, that the death of Uriah would be so agreeable to David, as to reconcile him to the loss which had been sustained. Thus he began already to be despised even by his accomplices! SCOTT.

Verse 25.

David spoke on this occasion with an insensibility about the lives of his subjects, which borders on infidelity, and strongly marks the state of his heart. On other occasions, he would have considered such an event as a rebuke, which required humiliation, prayer, and sacrifices, and a more entire dependence on God in future; (Notes, Josh. 7: 6—9. 1 Chr. 15:12—14.) and he would have censured the imprudence of the commanders, and charged them, on pain of his displeasure, to be more careful of the lives of their brethren. ID.

Verse 27.

Probably, David still attended on the ordinances of religion. By some ingenious self-flattery he endeavored to palliate his conduct to himself; and no one reproved him for it. Perhaps the general practice of other princes induced him to conclude, that persons in his high station were not, in this respect, bound to the same strictness as their subjects. However, though he had no deep remorse of conscience, we may be sure that he lost all spirituality and comfort in religion: for small transgressions, like slight wounds, give much pain to the believer's conscience; but enormous crimes, like a violent blow on the head, leave him for a season in an unaccountable state of insensibility. SCOTT.

But the thing, &c.] Such marriages, as this of David with Bath-sheba, with whom he had previously committed adultery, were not forbidden in the law, as some of the rabbies suppose; for this was needless, as both parties were condemned to die. and David was not afterwards ordered to put her away. Yet as he married her in order to cover his iniquity, and as the desire of possessing her may be supposed an inducement to the murder of Uriah, it formed an aggravation of the crime: and the whole transaction, from first to last, was in all respects displeasing to the Lord.—But why was this permitted? or why was it recorded? It is certain that thousands, through succeeding generations, have, by this fall of 'the man after God's own heart,' been prejudiced against true religion, hardened in infidelity, or emboldened in blasphemy: while others have thence taken occasion to commit habitual wickedness under a religious profession, and with presumptuous confidence, to the still greater discredit of the Gospel. It should, however, be considered, that all these have been, previously, either open enemies to true religion, or hypocritical pretenders to it. and it is the righteous purpose of God, that stumbling-blocks should be thrown her to his house, and she became his wife, and bare him a son. But the thing that David had done * displeased the LORD.

CHAP. XII.

Nathan by a parable causes David to pass sentence on himself, 1—6. David, convicted by Nathan, confesses his guilt; and is pardoned, but told that the child shall die, 7—14. The child is smitten and dies, though David fasted and prayed for him while he lived, 15—18. Finding that the child is dead, David worships God, and takes comfort, 19—23. Solomon is born, and named Jedidiah, 24, 25. David takes Rabbah, and treats the Ammonites with severity, 26—31.

AND [a] the LORD sent Nathan [b] unto David: and [c] he came unto him, and said unto him, [d] There were two men in one city; the one rich, and the other poor.

broad an intimation to the messenger, and by him to others, that David would be secretly pleased to hear that: for murder will out. And when men do such base things, they must expect to be bantered and upbraided with them, even by their inferiors. The messenger delivered his message agreeably to orders, v. 22—24.

IV. David receives the account with a secret satisfaction, v. 25. All is well, now Uriah is got out of the way. 'It was a chance of war.' He orders Joab to make the battle more strong next time, while he, by his sin, was weakening it, and provoking God to blast the undertaking!

Lastly, He married the widow, in a short time. She submitted to the ceremony of mourning, as little time as custom would admit, (v. 26.) then David took her, and she bare him a son. Uriah's revenge was prevented, but the birth of the child, so soon after the marriage, published the crime; sin will have shame; yet that was not the worst, The thing displeased the Lord; the whole matter of Uriah, (as it is called, 1 K. 15: 5.) the adultery, falsehood, murder, and this marriage, at last. The nearer any are to God in profession, the more displeasing to Him their sins are; for in them there is more ingratitude, treachery, and reproach, than in the sins of others.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—14. It seems to have been a great while after David's guilt with Bath-sheba, before he was brought to repentance. For, when Nathan was sent, the child was born, v. 14. What shall we think of David's state all this while? Can we imagine his heart never smote him? Or that he never repented in secret before God? I would willingly hope he did, and that Nathan was sent to him, immediately on the birth of the child, when the thing by that mean came to be publicly known and talked of, to draw from him an open confession of the sin, to the glory of God, the admonition of others, and that he might receive, by Nathan, absolution with certain limitations. But during these nine months, we may well suppose his comforts and exercises of grace suspended, and his communion with God interrupted; certainly, he penned no Psalms, his harp was out of tune, and his soul like a tree in winter, that has life in the root only; therefore, after Nathan had been with him, he prays, Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and open Thou my lips. Ps. 51: 12, 15. Let us observe,

I. The messenger: a prophet, Nathan, his faithful friend and confidant, to instruct and counsel, v. 1. David did not send for Nathan, but God sent Nathan to David. Note, Though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, He will not suffer them to lie still in it. He went on frowardly in the way of his heart, and, if left to himself, would have wandered endlessly, but (saith God) I have seen his ways, and will heal him, Isa. 57: 17, 18. He sends after us before we seek after Him, else we should certainly be lost. By Nathan God had sent him notice of his kind intentions toward him, (ch. 7: 4.) and now, by the same hand, He sends him this message of wrath. God's word in the mouth of his ministers must be received, whether it speak terror or comfort.

II. Nathan's message.

1. A parable, which seemed to David as a complaint against one of his subjects that had wronged his poor neighbor, in order to his righting the injured, and punishing the injurious. Nathan, it is likely, used to come on such errands, which made this the less suspected. It becomes those who have interest in princes, and free access to them, to intercede for the wronged, that they may have right.

(1.) In this [most searching parable], he showed him the evil of the sin he had been guilty of. He had many wives and concubines, whom he kept at a distance, as rich men keep their flocks in their fields; had he had but one, and had she been dear to him, as the ewe-lamb was to its owner, as the loving hind and the pleasant roe; he would have looked no further, Prov. 5: 19. Marriage is a remedy against fornication, but marrying many is not; for when once the law of unity is transgressed, the indulged lust will hardly stint itself. Uriah, like the poor man, had only one wife, who was to him as his own soul, and always lay in his own bosom, for he had no other, he desired no other. The traveller, (so Bp. Patrick from the Jewish writers,) was the evil imagination, disposition, or desire, which came into David's heart. It is called a traveller, they observe, for at first it is only so, but, in time, it becomes a

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—27. When a man has so far given place to the devil, as not only to commit scandalous sins, but to use disingenuous and base means of concealing them, and sees a prospect of having the whole exposed to public view; what shall prevent his being pushed forward, by the same influence and from the same motives, to treachery, malice, and murder, till crimes are multiplied and aggravated, beyond computation, and till every nobler consideration is extinguished? But can a real and eminent believer ever tread this downward path, and, as it were, fall asleep in the arms of Satan? (Notes, and P. O. Judg. 16:) Can a person, who has committed such atrocious crimes, and so long remains impenitent, be indeed a child of God, a member of Christ, a temple of the Holy Spirit, and an heir of eternal glory? Can one spark of divine life exist unextinguished in such an ocean? It is plain that these things are possible; but no man in such a case can have warranted evidence to conclude that he is a believer: the higher his confidence, who has sunk thus low in wickedness, the greater proof is there of his presumption and hypocrisy. Though grace be not lost in such an awful case, the assurance and consolation of it must be wholly suspended. Let not then any hypocrite, who resembles David in nothing but his transgressions, and who adds the habit of allowed sin to all other aggravations, buoy up his confidence with his example: let him first imitate David's humiliation, repentance, and other eminent graces, before he thinks himself, or requires others to consider him, as merely a backslider. (12: 13—15. 15: 24—29. 1 Chr. 29: Ps. 51:) Neither let any opposer or despiser of the truth say, Are these the fruits of faith and devotion? We confidently answer, No. They are the effects of a [corrupted] nature, the tendency of which to evil must be inconceivably strong, when it overcomes the contrary tendency of truth and grace in the heart of an eminent servant of God.—And let us all watch against the beginnings of negligence and self-indulgence, and keep at the utmost distance from that precipice, whence David fell, earnestly beseeching God to close our senses, imaginations, and affections to all forbidden objects, thoughts, and desires. But again: Is it possible that such a backslider from God can be recovered, and admitted afterwards to comfortable communion with Him? Doubtless it is; 'for with the LORD there is mercy, and with Him there is plenteous redemption:' and He will neither cast out one humble, penitent believer, whatever his former crimes have been; nor suffer Satan to pluck any of his sheep out of his hand. (John 10: 26—31.) Let then those who are fallen, return to the Lord without delay, and seek forgiveness through the Redeemer's atoning blood. SCOTT.

in the way of such men, that they 'may stumble, and fall, and be snared, and taken, and perish:' it is his holy will thus to detect the secret malignity of their hearts, and to make way for the display of his justice in their condemnation.—On the other hand, thousands, from age to age, have by this awful example been rendered more suspicious of themselves, more watchful, more afraid of temptation, more dependent on the Lord, and more fervent in prayer; and, by means of David's fall, have themselves been preserved from falling. Numbers, who have been overcome by temptation, have thus been preserved from despair. Every upright soul will eventually derive benefit from the impartial record of this event; and none will finally be injured by it, except those, who desire an excuse for sin, or an objection to the religion of the Bible. Bees will collect honey, and spiders poison, from the same plants, according to their different natures. No excuse can be made for David; he attempted none for himself: and much self-knowledge is requisite to account for his conduct, or to deem it possible that a man, who had so long enjoyed communion with God, in the highest exercises of devotion, could commit such enormous crimes, and continue so long impenitent. But the Lord's design in leaving him to himself was doubtless wise, righteous, and merciful; and He can and will over-rule it for great good to those who fear and love Him. The glory of all the good is his due; the blame of all the evil, original or consequent, belongs to those who commit it. (Gen. 50:20. 2 Chr. 32: 30—33, v. 31. Matt. 26:69—75.) SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—6. 'There is never more use of wisdom, than in the contrivance of reprehension; especially of princes, and great persons.' Patrick. There scarcely ever was any thing more calculated, on the one hand to awaken emotions of sympathy, and on the other, those of indignation, than the case here supposed, and the several circumstances, by which the heart must be interested in the poor man's case, and by which the unfeeling oppression of his rich neigh *meat, and drank of his own cup, and [s] lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter.

4 And there came [h] a traveller unto the rich man, and he spared to take of his own flock, and of his own herd, to dress for the wayfaring man that was come unto him; but [i] took the poor man's lamb, and dressed it for the man that was come to him.

5 And [k] David's anger was greatly kindled against the man; and he said to Nathan, [l] As the LORD liveth, the man that hath done this thing † shall surely die:

6 And he shall [m] restore the lamb four-fold, because he did this thing, and [n] because he had no pity.

7 And Nathan said to David, [o] Thou art the man. Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, [p] I anointed thee king over Israel, and [q] I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul:

8 And I gave thee thy master's house, and thy [r] master's wives into thy bosom, and [s] gave thee the house of Israel and of Judah; and, if that had been too little, [t] I would moreover have given unto thee such and such things.

9 Wherefore hast thou [u] despised the commandment of the LORD, [x] to do evil in his sight? [y] thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword, and hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon.

10 Now therefore [z] the sword shall never depart from thine house; [a] because thou hast despised me, and [b] hast taken the wife of Uriah the Hittite to be thy wife.

guest, and in conclusion, is master of the house. Yet some observe, that, in David's breast, lust was but as a wayfaring man that tarries only for a night, it did not dwell and rule there.

(2.) By this parable, he drew from David a sentence against himself. For David, supposing it to be a case in fact, and not doubting the truth of it, when he had it from Nathan himself, gave judgment immediately against the offender, and confirmed it with an oath, v. 5, 6. For his injustice he should restore four-fold. (Ex. 22: 1.) For his tyranny and cruelty, he should be put to death. If a poor man steal from a rich man, even to satisfy his soul when he is hungry, he shall make restitution, though it cost him all the substance of his house, Prov. 6: 30, 31, and adultery is alluded to, v. 32. But if a rich man steal for stealing sake, not for want but wantonness, merely that he may be imperious and vexatious, he deserves to die for it; for to him restitution is no punishment, or next to none. If the sentence be thought too severe, it must be imputed to the present roughness of David's temper, being under guilt, and not having himself as yet received mercy.

2. He closed in with him, at length, in the application of the parable. In beginning with a parable, he showed his prudence; but here, in his application, he shows his faithfulness, and deals as plainly and roundly with king David himself, as if he had been a common person. In plain terms, 'Thou art the man, who hast done this wrong, and one incomparably greater, to thy neighbor; and therefore, by thine own sentence, thou deservest to die, and shalt be judged out of thine own mouth. Though he took the lamb, he did not cause the owner thereof to lose his life, as thou, therefore much more art thou worthy to die.'

Nathan now speaks, not as a petitioner for a poor man, but as an ambassador from the great God, with whom is no respect of persons.

(1.) God, by Nathan, reminds David of the great things He had done and designed for him, v. 7, 8. See how liberal God is in his gifts; we are not straitened in Him. Where He has given much, He yet gives more. And God's bounty to us is a great aggravation of our discontent, and desire of forbidden fruit. It is ungrateful to covet what God has prohibited, while we have liberty to pray for what God has promised, which is enough.

(2.) He charges him with a high contempt of the divine authority, in these sins, v. 9. This is the spring, and malignity of sin, that it is making light of the divine law, and the Law-maker; as if its obligation were weak, its precepts trifling, and the threats not at all formidable. His adultery, which began the mischief, is not mentioned perhaps, because he was already convinced of that, but, the murder of Uriah is twice mentioned, and aggravated. The marrying of Bath-sheba is likewise twice mentioned, because he thought there was no harm in that, v. 9, 10. To marry her whom he had before defiled, and whose husband he had slain, was an affront on the ordinance of marriage, making that not only to palliate, but in a manner to consecrate, such villanies. In all this, he despised the word of the Lord, (so the Heb.) not only his commandment in general, which forbade such things, but the word of promise, God had sent him by Nathan some time before, that He would build him a house; which sacred promise, if he had had a due value and veneration for, he would not thus have polluted his house with lust and blood.

(3.) He threatens an entail of judgments on his family for this sin, v. 10. God had promised, his mercy should not depart from him and his house, (ch. 7: 15.) yet here threatens that the sword should not depart. Those may lie under great and long afflictions, who yet shall not be excluded from the grace of the covenant. The reason given is, Because thou hast despised Me. Note, Those who despise the word and law of God, despise God Himself.

It is particularly threatened, that his children should be his grief; and his wives should be publicly debauched; it is not said by his own son, lest the accomplishment be hindered by the prediction being too plain; but it was done by Absalom; (ch. 16: 21, 22.) He that defiled his neighbor's wife, should have his own defiled, for thus that sin used to be punished; Job 31: 10. bor was aggravated. Several expressions, however, might have excited a suspicion, that more was intended, than merely to plead the cause of an injured man against his oppressor: yet David evidently supposed it to be matter of fact, till Nathan made the application.—Yet this parable, apposite and beautiful as it was, pointed out only a small part of the enormity of David's conduct. Uriah's loyal and gallant services, and David's ingratitude and treachery, with the murder of him and his fellow soldiers, were not so much as alluded to. His injury to Uriah and Bath-sheba, in the crime of adultery, was alone shadowed forth: for perhaps the prophet meant to bring him by degrees to a view of his exceeding sinfulness; and would not make the case too exact in all particulars, lest he should suspect his intentions, and be kept from giving sentence against himself. Verse 8.

Wives.] Or, Women. We read of no more than one wife of Saul, and Rizpah his concubine; (21:8. 1 Sam. 14:50.) and probably he had not any more. The women therefore of his court and family seem to be meant; which, according to the custom of the east, came into David's possession, when he succeeded to the kingdom. But if Saul had more wives or concubines, it is not probable David married any of them, as Saul was his father-in-law. The LORD, by giving David these women in his providence, no more sanctioned his polygamy, than his giving Israel a king proved they did well in desiring and asking one; or than his giving David's concubines to Absalom, sanctioned his detestable incest. (11,12. 16:20—23. 1 Sam. 12:11—19.) But the multitude of unmarried women, of whom David had it in his power to make choice, aggravated his guilt in seizing on the wife of another man. Nay, had he thought that any thing conducive to his comfort was yet wanting, he was allowed to ask for it, and the Lord declared that He would not have denied it, if He had seen it good for him. Despised me, &c.] (Note, 1 Sam. 2:30.) When David despised the word of God, he despised God Himself; even his power and authority,

11 Thus saith the LORD, Behold, [c] I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and [d] I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbor, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of this sun;

12 For thou didst it [e] secretly: but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun.

13 And [f] David said unto Nathan, [g] I have sinned against the LORD. And Nathan said unto David, [h] The LORD also hath put away thy sin; [i] thou shalt not die.

14 Howbeit, because [k] by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the LORD to blaspheme, [l] the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die.

[Practical Observations.]

15 ¶ And Nathan departed unto his house: and the LORD [m] struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick.

16 David therefore [n] besought God for the child; and David * fasted, and went in, and [o] lay all night upon the earth.

The sin was secret, and industriously concealed, but the punishment should be open, and industriously proclaimed, to his shame, whose sin in the matter of Uriah, though committed many years before, would then be called to mind, and commonly talked of. The punishment often answers to the sin; here is blood for blood, and uncleanness for uncleanness.

3. David's penitent confession of his sin, hereupon, v. 13. He says not a word to excuse himself, or extenuate it. It is probable he said more, but this is enough to show he was truly humbled, and submitted himself to the conviction. He owns his guilt, I have sinned; and he aggravates it; it was against the Lord: Ps. 51: 4. Against Thee, Thee only.

4. His pardon declared, on this penitent confession, but with a reserve of judgment. (1) 'Thou shalt not die;' i. e. ' not eternally, nor be for ever put away from God.' The obligation to punishment is hereby cancelled and vacated. He shall not come into condemnation; that is the nature of forgiveness. David deserved to die as an adulterer and murderer, but God would not cut him off, as He might justly have done. See how ready God is to forgive sin. To this instance, perhaps, David refers, Ps 32: 5, I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest. Let not great sinners despair of finding mercy with God, if they truly repent; for who is a God like unto Him, pardoning iniquity? (2.) Yet he pronounces a sentence of death on the child, v. 14. [1.] David had, by his sin, wronged God in his honor. The wicked people of that generation would triumph in David's fall, and speak ill of God and of his law, when they saw one guilty of such foul enormities, that professed such an honor both for Him and it. And, to this day, there are those who reproach God, and are hardened in sin, through the example of David. Note, There is this great evil in the scandalous sins of those that profess religion, that they furnish the enemies of God and religion with matter for reproach and blasphemy. Rom. 2: 24. [2.] God will therefore vindicate his honor, by showing his displeasure against David for this sin, and letting the world see, that, though He loves David, He hates his sin; and He chooses to do it by the death of the child. Perhaps, the diseases and deaths of infants were not so common in those days as they are now, which might make this, as an unusual thing, the more evident token of God's displeasure; according to the word He had often said, that He would visit the sins of the fathers on the children.

V. 15—25. God, in making use of Nathan as an instrument to bring David to repentance, and as the herald both of mercy and judgment, put an honor on the ministry, and magnified his Word above all his name. David named one of his sons by Bath-sheba, Nathan, in honor of this prophet, (1 Chr. 3: 5.) and it was that son, of whom Christ, the great Prophet, lineally descended, Luke 3: 31. When Nathan retired, David, probably, retired likewise, and penned Ps. 51. in which (though he had been assured that his sin was pardoned) he prays earnestly for pardon, and greatly laments his sin; for then will true penitents be ashamed of what they have done, when God is pacified toward them, Ezek. 16: 63.

Here is, I. The child's illness, v. 15. The diseases and death of infants, that have not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, especially as they are sometimes sadly circumstanced, are sensible proofs of the original sin in which they are conceived.

II. David's humiliation under this token of God's displeasure, and the intercession he made with God for the life of the child, v. 16, 17. was as evidence of the truth of his repentance. For, 1. Hereby it appeared he was willing to bear the shame of his sin, in that he was so far from desiring the death of the child, as most, in such circum-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. Our falls into sin originate from the evil of our depraved hearts, but our recoveries are from the Lord. He commonly employs the ministry of the Word in bringing sinners to repentance: and the plain, authoritative declaration of the divine law, and of the evil nature and effects of sin, is the appointed method of awakening the careless conscience, and of bringing men to condemn themselves.—Instruction and reproof are not personal; provided the general cases of multitudes are described, and the peculiarities of an individual's character are not so marked, as to draw the attention of the auditors from themselves to him. But it is often necessary, in private, to be still more explicit and particular, with such professed Christians as cannot, or will not, understand the plainest public address; and this without reserve, or respect of persons, and with all seriousness, energy, and expostulation. It will never be well with the church of God, till secret lamentations over unreproved scandals and abuses, and private conversations concerning the faults of the absent, be generally changed, by the ministers of Christ especially, for faithful, plain dealing with men in private: and those who are of reputation ought to take the lead, and to set the example, in this arduous but salutary business.—But, however iniquity may have prevailed, where true grace exists there is also sensibility, and a ground in which the Word of God may take root. (Matt. 13: 23.) The humbled sinner will not be offended by his faithful reprover, but rather thank him; and God will never refuse forgiveness to true penitents.—It is, however, grievous to think, what great occasion of blasphemy to the enemies of the Lord the falls of his professing people afford: yet none except his enemies will make this use of them; and the open confessions of the penitent offenders, their future holy conduct, the severe corrections which they experience, and their patience under them, will manifest the equity and purity, as well as the mercy of God, in pardoning their offences; and will mark an essential difference, of habitual character and disposition, between them and unhumbled sinners of every description. (Rom. 7: 13—17.) SCOTT.

his justice and purity, his omnipresence and omniscience, his favor and wrath, and all his glorious perfections: else, he would not thus have offended Him, for the base gratification of his lusts. This was an aggravation of his crimes, less obvious to man's natural apprehensions, but full of deeper malignity, than all those enumerated in the former ch. (11:1—17. Ps. 51:4. Rom. 2:4—6.)—The word rendered never, in this connection, only implies perpetuity. (Note, Gen. 17:7, 8.) So long as David lived, one after another of his family was slain, and Adonijah just after his death. SCOTT.

Verses 11, 12.

David was not at Jerusalem when Absalom perpetrated his abominable crime; but it was committed in so shameless a manner, that it was as notorious as if he had seen it with his own eyes.—The Lord raised up this evil out of his own house: yet He did not put the wickedness into the hearts of his sons; but He left them to their own vile passions, and over-ruled the effects of them for David's chastisement. (Luke 22:21—23, v. 22. Acts 2:22—24. 4:23—28.) ID.

Verse 13.

The dormant spark of divine grace in David's heart now began to rekindle; 'I have sinned against the LORD.' The words are few; but the event proved them to have been the language of genuine repentance, which regards sin as committed against the authority and glory of the Lord, whether or not it have occasioned evil to any fellow creature. (Note, Ps. 51:4.) And Nathan said, (13) Perhaps not at that time, but when the sincerity of his repentance had been further proved. SCOTT.

Verse 14.

Perhaps the Ammonites, and other idolatrous enemies of God and Israel, had received information of these sins, and blasphemed his name on that account: and the wicked Israelites, especially those of Saul's party, would reflect on the divine justice, in that Saul had been rejected for apparently less heinous crimes, and David was spared notwithstanding these enormities. (Matt. 18:7—9. 1 Tim. 6:1—5. Tit. 2:3—6.) But the Lord did not punish Saul above his deservings, and therefore did him no injustice in forgiving David: and He judges not merely by the outward action, but by the inward disposition of the heart; and there He perceived a very important difference, and even contrariety, in the two characters. In the temporal punishment, however, of David in his family, the Lord determined to silence these blasphemies; and began by the death of the child Bath-sheba had born to him. This event, though in fact a mercy to all parties, yet being predicted and publicly declared to be a rebuke for his sin, would be for the time a sharp and painful chastisement. ID.

Verse 16.

17 And [p] the elders of his house arose, and went to him, to raise him up from the earth: but he would not, neither did he eat bread with them.

18 And it came to pass on the seventh day, that the child died. And the servants of David feared to tell him that the child was dead: for they said, Behold, while the child was yet alive we spake unto him, and he would not hearken unto our voice: how will he then * vex himself, if we tell him that the child is dead?

19 But when David saw that his servants whispered, David perceived that the child was dead: therefore David said unto his servants, Is the child dead? And they said, He is dead.

20 Then David [q] arose from the earth, and washed, and [r] anointed himself, and changed his apparel, and came into [s] the house of the LORD, and worshipped: then he came to his own house; and when he required, they set bread before him, and he did eat.

21 Then said his servants unto him, [t] What thing is this that thou hast done? thou didst fast and weep for the child while it was alive; but when the child was dead thou didst rise and eat bread.

22 And he said, While the child was yet alive, [u] I fasted and wept: for I said, Who can tell whether God will be gracious to me, that the child may live?

23 But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? Can I bring him back again? [x] I shall go to him, but [y] he shall not return to me.

24 And David comforted Bath-sheba his wife, and went in unto her, and lay with her: and [z] she bare a son, and he called his name Solomon; and the LORD loved him.

25 And he sent by the hand of [a] Nathan the prophet, and he called his name †Jedidiah, because of the LORD.

stances, do, that he prayed earnestly for its life. True penitents patiently bear the reproach of their youth, and of their youthful lusts, Jer. 31: 19. 2. A very tender, compassionate spirit appeared in this, and great humanity, above what is commonly found in men, especially men of war, toward little children, even their own; and this was another sign of a broken contrite spirit: they that are penitent, will be pitiful. 3. He discovered, in this, a great concern for another world, which is an evidence of repentance. While the child is in the reach of prayer, he earnestly intercedes with God for it, chiefly (as we may suppose) that its soul might be safe and happy in another world. 4. He discovered, in this, a holy dread of God and of his displeasure. He deprecated the death of the child, chiefly as it was a token of God's anger against him and his house. Ps. 6: 1.

III. The death of the child; (v. 18.) when it was seven days old, and therefore not circumcised, which David might, perhaps, interpret as a further token of God's displeasure, that it died before it was brought under the seal of the covenant; yet he does not therefore doubt of its being happy, for the benefits of the covenant do not depend on the seals.

IV. David's wonderful calmness, when he understood the child was dead.

Having prepared himself, he went up to the tabernacle, and worshipped, like Job when he heard of the death of his children. He went to acknowledge the hand of God in the affliction, to humble himself under it, and to submit to his holy will in it; to thank God that he himself was spared, and his sin pardoned; and to pray that God would not proceed in his controversy with him, nor stir up all his wrath. Is any afflicted? Let him pray. Then he went to his own house, and refreshed himself, as one who found benefit by his religion in the day of his affliction. Observe

The reason he gave for what he did. 1. That while the child was alive, he thought it his duty to importune the divine favor towards it, v. 22. Nathan had indeed said the child should die, but, for aught he knew, the threatening might be conditional, as that concerning Hezekiah: on his great humiliation and earnest prayer, He that had so often heard the voice of his weeping, might be pleased to reverse the sentence, and spare the child; Who can tell whether God will yet be gracious to me? When our relations and friends have fallen sick, the prayer of faith has prevailed much; while there is life, there is hope, and while there is hope, there is room for prayer. 2. That, the child being dead, he thought it as much his duty to be satisfied in the divine disposal concerning it, v. 23. Two things checked his grief: (1.) I cannot bring him back again; and again, he shall not return to me. The dead are out of the reach of prayer; nor can our tears profit them; we can neither weep nor pray them back to this life. Wherefore then should we fast? Yet David fasted and wept for Jonathan when he was dead, in honor to him. (2.) I shall go to him; 1st. To him, to the grave. Note, The consideration of our own death should moderate our sorrow at the death of our relations; instead of mourning for their death, we should think of our own: and whatever loss we have of them now, we shall die shortly, and go to them. 2dly. To him, to heaven, to a state of blessedness. Godly parents have great reason to hope concerning their children that die in infancy, that it is well with their souls in the other world; for the promise is to us and to our seed, which shall be performed to those that do not put a bar in their own door, as infants do not. This may comfort us when our children are removed from us by death; they are better provided for, than they could be in this world.

V. The birth of Solomon. Though David's marrying Bath-sheba had displeased the Lord, yet he was not therefore commanded to divorce her; so far from this, God gave him that son by her, on whom the covenant of royalty should be entailed. Bath-sheba, no doubt, was greatly afflicted with the sense of her sin, and the tokens of God's displeasure. But God having restored to David the joys of his salvation, he comforted her with the same comforts with which he himself was comforted of God, v. 24. And both he and she had reason to be comforted in the tokens of God's reconciliation to them.

1. Inasmuch as, by his providence, He gave them a son, not, as the former, in anger, but graciously. They called him Solomon, peaceful, in token of God's being at peace with them, of the prosperity entailed on him, and because he was to be a type of Christ, the Prince of Peace. The way to have our creature-comforts either continued or restored, or the loss of them made up some other way, is, cheerfully to resign them to God.

2. Inasmuch as, by his grace, He particularly owned and favored that son; The Lord loved him, (v. 24.) and (v. 25.) ordered him, by the prophet Nathan, to be called Jedidiah, beloved of the Lord; so well ordered was the covenant, and the crown entailed by it, that it took away all attainders, and corruption of blood, signifying, that those who were by nature children of wrath and disobedience, should, by the covenant of grace, not only spirit was at that time peculiarly tender; and perhaps Bath-sheba likewise was overwhelmed with a load of guilt and sorrow. (24)—We may conceive of him, as laying aside his royal robes, and appearing as a penitent, in a mean and mournful garment, fasting, lying on the ground, confessing his guilt, mourning over it, and praying with all fervency, and without intermission, during the whole night. Verse 22.

Who can tell, &c.] 'David, and indeed all others, under the Mosaic dispensation, were so satisfied that all God's threatenings and promises were conditional, that even in the most positive assertions relative to judgments, &c. they sought for a change of purpose. David thought the child's life, notwithstanding Nathan's positive declaration, might perhaps depend on some unexpressed conditions; such as earnest prayer, fasting, humiliation, &c. and in these he continued while there was hope. This appears to be the sole reason of his importunity.' DR. A. CLARKE

Verses 24, 25.

David's marriage with Bath-sheba was in many respects very sinful; (11:27.) yet it must not be disannulled. In the mystery of the divine counsels, it made way for the performance of the promises before given: (7:12—16.) and Bath-sheba has her name inserted in the genealogy of the Redeemer!—As a token of the Lord's reconciliation to David and Bath-sheba, this son by her was named Solomon, or the peaceable; and Jedidiah, or Beloved of the LORD, because of the LORD's peculiar favor to him. (M.—Notes, Gen. 49:10. Matt. 1:20—23.) In this he especially typified Him of whom the Father hath said, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.'—'It is observable, that there is not one word said to Bath-sheba, in all this relation. . . She was punished . . . . in the calamity that befell David; who enticed her, not she him, to commit the foul sin of adultery; and she was innocent in the murder of Uriah.' Patrick. It seems, she was released from the legal punishment of death, by the same act of grace, which pardoned David: but she was, probably, for some time both in great sorrow and distress, and overwhelmed with fears, remorse, and shame. SCOTT.

26 ¶ And [b]Joab fought against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and took the royal city.

27 And Joab sent messengers to David, and said, I have fought against [c] Rabbah, and have taken the city of waters.

29 And David gathered all the people together, and went to Rabbah, and fought against it, and took it.

be reconciled, but made favorites. And, in this name, he typified Jesus Christ, that blessed Jedidiah, the Son of God's love, concerning whom God declared again and again, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

V. 26—31. We have here an account of the conquest of Rabbah, and other cities of the Ammonites; which comes in here, after the birth of David's child, but most probably was effected a good while before, and soon after the death of Uriah, perhaps during the days of Bath-sheba's mourning for him.

Observe, 1. God was very gracious in giving David this great success against his enemies, notwithstanding the sin he had been guilty of. Justly might He have made the sword of Ammon which murdered Uriah, from thenceforward, a plague to David and his kingdom; yet He breaks it, and makes David's sword victorious, even before he repented; that this goodness of God might lead him to repentance. Good reason had David to own, that God dealt not with him according to his sins, Ps. 103: 10.

2. Joab acted very honestly and honorably; for when he had taken the city of waters, the royal city, where the palace was, and from which the rest of the city was supplied with water, and which, therefore, on the cutting off of that, would be obliged speedily to surrender, he sent to David to come in person to complete this great action, that he might have the praise of it, v. 26—28. Herein he showed himself a faithful servant, that sought his master's honor, and his own only in subordination to his; and left an example to the servants of the Lord Jesus, in every thing they do, to consult his honor: Not unto us, but unto thy name, give glory.

3. David was both too haughty, and too severe, on this occasion, and neither so humble nor so tender as he should have been. (1.) He seems to have been too fond of the crown of the king of Ammon, v. 30. The heart that is truly humbled for sin, is dead to worldly glory, and looks upon it with a holy contempt. (2.) He seems to have been too harsh with his prisoners of war, v. 31. Had he made examples of those only, who had abused his ambassadors, advised or assisted in it, that being a violation of the law of nations, it might be looked upon as a piece of necessary justice for terror to other nations; but to be thus severe with all the cities of the children of Ammon, (i. e. the garrisons or soldiers of the cities,) was extremely rigorous, and a sign that David's heart was not yet made soft by repentance, else the bowels of his compassion would not have been thus shut up.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—31. The Lord often causes his offending people to read their sins in their punishment; He puts them to open shame for their secret offences; and, by the sufferings of those whom they most tenderly love, He fills their hearts with the keenest anguish. Under such rebukes they will be led to deeper and deeper humiliation, to chasten themselves with fasting, and to pour out more fervent and incessant prayers; and especially for those who are suffering on their account, and are unable to pray for themselves. After the same manner, as long as life lasts, let the discouraged sinner seek the Lord, humble himself, and pour out his prayers before Him; if only able to say, 'Who knoweth if God will be gracious to me!'—Those, who are ignorant of the divine life, cannot comprehend the reasons of a believer's conduct in his varied experiences: and in a thousand different ways they will show their incapacity to judge of the consistency and reasons of his behavior. (Acts 16: 1—5. P. O. 1 Cor. 2: 10—16.) But God accepts those services which man censures: a humble, submissive spirit prepares the way for divine consolations, notwithstanding former crimes; and we should encourage the desponding hearts of our fellow sinners, with the comforts which the Lord has graciously afforded us.—Our prayers for our children are graciously answered, if some of them die in their tender infancy, (for they are well taken care of,) and the others live 'beloved of the LORD.'—Vengeance will in due season overtake the persecutors and abusers of God's people and ministers; and in their severest sufferings He will be righteous, though the instruments should be unreasonably and iniquitously severe.—In proportion as we lose sight of the honor that cometh from God, we become ambitious and vain of worldly distinctions: (Note, 2 Kings 20: 12—19.) and we are most compassionate, kind, and forgiving to our fellow-sinners, when we most feel our need of the Lord's forgiving love, and experience the comfort of it.—Finally, in whatever service the Lord may please to employ us, may we, (as Joab with David,) execute his will faithfully, and then give Him the whole glory without reserve. SCOTT.

Verses 26—31.

The sacred historian, having finished the account of David's fall and repentance, resumes the subject of the war with Ammon.—The crown of the king of the Ammonites is said to have weighed a talent; but that, being above a hundred weight, seems enormous: probably it means the value of it with the precious stones.—It is not certain what the punishments were, which he inflicted on the prisoners; whether he put them to death, under saws, axes, and harrows; or whether he condemned them to wear out their lives in severe bondage, by various labors, [as was then usual, in conquerors to the conquered; when they did not torture or murder them.] SCOTT.

Some think the Syriac talent is meant, which was but one-fourth of an Hebrew one. After all, the phrase from off may be rendered from above or over his head, and so it was set above or over the head of David, being supported by some means or other that its weight did not bear thereon.' While this weight is so uncertain, no valid objection can be urged against the narrative, on the ground of its supposed incredibility. CARPENTER. We know, that it is not the custom of kings to wear their crowns except on great occasions, and that they have a heavier crown for great, and a lighter, [see the crowns in the cut,] for ordinary occasions. The stately head-dresses on the monuments of Egyp are enormous; and the crown here must have been more for show than use; besides it is said 'it was set on David's head,' and such form of expression seems to imply something of unusual ceremony, besides the agency of others. 'Sawing asunder and hacking human beings, [though, (says Michaelis,) the common cruelties to prisoners, especially among the Canaanites, and their descendants the Carthaginians, so that even the cruel Romans complain of them, these] have no place in this text, no more than they had in David's conduct. Though our translation is by far the best, in any language, ancient or modern, yet as Biblical criticism, if it existed, was in its infancy when it was made, it stands much in need of revision.' Dr. A. Clarke, and Boothr. Indeed most of the weapons of infidelity are furnished from this source, viz. misconceptions of translators. ED. 'The whole mistake here seems to have arisen from an error in the Heb. of 1 Chr. 20:3. by the omission of a small part of one letter; for the word, instead of vyshm, (and he put,) is now vyshr, (and he sawed.) This corruption was probably very ancient, because it is expressed in the Sept. Five Heb. mss. too read it in Chr. as in Sam. i. e. he put them to saws.' BOOTHR.

'The charge of [excessive] cruelty will be removed, by following the translation of Danzius, which I think the words will bear, and he obliged the people that were in it to go out, and put them to the saw, to cut stones; and to the iron mines to dig there; and to the axes of iron, to cut wood with; after he had made them to pass with their king out of the city.' GILL. CHAP. XIII.

Amnon, David's son, loves his sister Tamar, 1, 2: and by Jonadab's advice he feigns sickness, that Tamar might wait on him; and taking that opportunity, he ravishes her, 3—14. He hates her, and drives her away, and she in grief and shame retires to Absalom, 15—20. David is angry; but Absalom conceals his hatred, 21, 22. Absalom invites his brethren to a feast; where Amnon at his command is murdered, 23—29. David grieves vehemently, supposing that all his sons are slain; but is comforted by Jonadab, and learns the truth, 30—36. Absalom flees to Geshur; but David longs after him, 37—39.

AND it came to pass after this, that [a] Absalom, the son of David, had [b] a fair sister, whose name was [c] Tamar; and Amnon the son of David [d] loved her.

2 And Amnon was so [e] vexed, that he fell sick for his sister Tamar; for she was a virgin: and [*] Amnon thought it hard for him to do any thing to her.

3 But Amnon had [f] a friend, whose name was Jonadab, the son of [g] Shimeah, David's brother: and Jonadab was a very [h] subtle man.

4 And he said unto him, [i] Why art thou, being the king's son, † lean ‡ from day to day? wilt thou not tell me? And Amnon said unto him, [k] I love Tamar, [l] my brother Absalom's sister.

5 And Jonadab said unto him, [m] Lay thee down on thy bed, and make thyself sick: and when thy father cometh to see thee, say unto him, I pray thee, let my sister Tamar come, and give me meat, and dress the meat in my sight, that I may see it, and eat it at her hand.

6 So Amnon lay down, and made himself sick: and when the king was come to see him, Amnon said unto the king, I pray thee, let Tamar my sister come and [n] make me a couple of cakes in my sight, that I may eat at her hand.

7 Then David sent home to Tamar, saying, Go now to thy brother Amnon's house, and dress him meat.

8 So Tamar went to her brother Amnon's house; and he was laid down. And she took § flour, and kneaded it, and made cakes in his sight, and did bake the cakes.

9 And she took a pan, and poured them out before him; but he refused to eat. [o] And Amnon said, Have out all men from me: and they went out every man from him.

10 And Amnon said unto Tamar, Bring the meat into the chamber, that I may eat of thine hand. And Tamar took the cakes which she had made, and brought them into the chamber to Amnon her brother.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—20. The righteous God had lately told David, by Nathan, that, to chastise him for his sin, he would raise up evil against him, out of his own house, ch. 12: 11. And here, in the very next ch. we find the evil beginning to rise; henceforward, he was followed with one trouble after another. Thus God chastened him with the rod of men, yet assured him that his loving-kindness He would not utterly take away. Adultery and murder were David's sins, and those sins, among his children, (Amnon defiling his sister Tamar, and Absalom murdering his brother Amnon,) were the beginnings of his punishment, and the more grievous, because he had reason to fear his bad example might help to bring them to these wickednesses: and because he was unwittingly made accessary to both, by sending Tamar to Amnon, and Amnon to Absalom.

We have here a particular account of the abominable wickedness of Amnon; his character, we have reason to think, was bad in other things; if he had not forsaken God, he had never been given up to these vile affections. We do not find David's children imitated him in his devotion; but his false steps they trod in, and repented not. Parents know not how fatal the consequences may be, if, in any instance, they give their children bad examples. Observe the steps of Amnon's sin.

I. The devil, as an unclean spirit, put it into his heart to lust after his sister Tamar, who was fair, v. 1. They that are handsome, have no reason, on that account, to be proud, but great reason to stand on their watch. Amnon's lust was, 1. Unnatural in itself; but such a spirit of contradiction there is in man's corrupt nature, that still it desires forbidden fruit, and the more strongly it is forbidden, the more greedily it is desired. [She was doubtless kept secluded, as the eastern women are, especially virgins, which explains v. 2.] What wickedness so vile, as not to find admittance into an unsanctified, unguarded heart, left to itself? 2. Very uneasy to him. Fleshly lusts are their own punishment, v. 2. See what a hard master sinners serve, and how heavy his yoke is.

II. The devil, as a subtle servant, put it into his head how to compass this wicked design. Amnon had a friend, really an enemy, a kinsman that had in him more of David's blood (he was his nephew) than of David's spirit, a subtle man, cunning to carry on any bad design, especially an intrigue of this nature, v. 3.

1. He noticed Amnon looked ill, and concluded he was love-sick, v. 4. Content and comfort are not always to be found in royal palaces. He tells him not to pine away for that which, lawful or unlawful, he as the king's son may of course have: 'Your will is law.' Thus Jezebel to Ahab in a like case, (1 K. 21: 7.) Dost not thou govern Israel? The abuse of power is the most dangerous temptation of the great.

2. Amnon having the impudence to own his wicked lust, miscalling it love, Jonadab put him in a way to compass his design, v. 5. Had he been what he pretended, (Amnon's friend,) he would have startled at the mention of such horrid wickedness, and used his subtilty to divert Amnon from it, by recommending some other to him, whom he might lawfully marry. Note, The case of those is very miserable, whose friends, instead of admonishing and reproving them, flatter and forward them in their sinful ways.

3. Amnon follows these directions, and thus gets Tamar within his reach, v. 6. David was always fond of his children, and concerned if any thing ailed them; he no sooner hears Amnon is sick, than he comes himself to visit him. We may suppose, when David came to see his sick son, he gave him good counsel to make a right use of his affliction, and prayed with him, which did not alter his wicked purpose. Tamar innocently goes, not disdaining, in obedience to her father, and love to her brother, (though but her half-brother,) to be his nurse, v. 8, 9. Though a king's daughter, a great beauty, (v. 1.) and well-dressed, (v. 18.) yet she did not think it below her to knead and bake cakes, nor had she done it now, if she had not been used to it. Good housewifery is not a thing below the greatest ladies, nor ought they to think it a disparagement to them. The virtuous woman, whose husband sits among the elders, yet works willingly with her hands. Modern ages have not been destitute of such instances, nor is it so unfashionable as some would make it. Preparing for the sick should be more the care and delight of ladies, than preparing for the nice; charity more than curiosity.

4. Having got her to him, he contrives to have her alone; (v. 9.) The sick must be humored, and think they have a privilege to command, The mask is thrown off, v. 11. A base affront to think it possible to persuade Tamar to such wickedness! But it is common for those that live in uncleanness, to think others such as themselves.

III. The devil, as a strong tempter, deafens his ear to all the reasonings with which she resisted his assaults, and would have persuaded him to de-

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. David seems to have been far too indulgent of his children: probably, their mothers had a great share in their education, and some of these instilled into them bad principles; indeed these are the natural effects of polygamy. SCOTT.

Verses 3, 4.

Jonadab was 'a very subtle man;' (32, 33. 16:20—23. Gen. 3:1.) one very sagacious, as to this present world; or rather, a very crafty courtier, who readily discerned the inclinations of his superiors, and was very ingenious in devising means for the gratification of them. Had he not interposed, probably Amnon's passion might have been suppressed, and at length supplanted by an affection for some other object. (1 K. 21:4—7.) Amnon was the heir-apparent of the crown: David was growing old, and probably showed Jonadab but little favor, though he was his nephew; being the son of David's brother Shimeah, called also Shammah, and Shimma. (32. 1 Sam. 16:9. 1 Chr. 2:13.) He therefore paid court to Amnon; and supposed that his rank and authority would bear him out in any crime he was disposed to commit. SCOTT.

(3.) Very subtle.] 'We talk of the simplicity and excellence of primitive times! "Say not then, what is the cause that the former days were better than these." Take them altogether, we may thank God that they are past; and pray Him that they may never return.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 5—14.

It is probable, Tamar accompanied her complaints and expostulations with unavailing outcries, which Amnon's domestics doubtless disregarded: for she seems to have been entirely free from blame in the scandalous transaction. SCOTT.

(8.) Was laid down.] 'From the cloisters and galleries [of an eastern house, note and cut, 11:9.] we are conducted into spacious chambers, of the same length with the court, but seldom or never 12 And she answered him, Nay, my brother, do not [*] force me; for [†] no such thing ought to be done in Israel: do not thou this [q] folly.

13 And I, whither shall I cause my shame to go? and as for thee, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel. [r] Now therefore, I pray thee, speak unto the king; for he will not withhold me from thee.

14 Howbeit he would not hearken unto her voice; but, being stronger than she, [s] forced her, and lay with her.

[Practical Observations.]

15 Then Amnon [t] hated her [‡] exceedingly; so that the hatred wherewith he hated her was greater than the love wherewith he had loved her: and Amnon said unto her, Arise, be gone.

16 And she said unto him, There is no cause; this evil in sending me away is greater than the other that thou didst unto me: but he would not hearken unto her.

17 Then he called his servant that ministered unto him, and said, Put now this woman out from me, and bolt the door after her.

18 And she had [u] a garment of divers colors upon her: for with such robes were the king's daughters that were virgins apparelled. Then his servant brought her out, and bolted the door after her.

19 And Tamar [x] put ashes on her head, and rent her garment of divers colors that was on her, and [y] laid her hand on her head, and went on crying.

20 And Absalom her brother said unto her, Hath [§] Amnon thy brother been with thee? [z] but hold now thy peace, my sister: he is thy brother; [‖] regard not this thing. So Tamar remained [¶] desolate in her brother Absalom's house.

21 But when king David heard of all these things, [a] he was very wroth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. The judgments of God upon those, who are finally saved, may be so terrible, varied, and continued, as effectually to proclaim his abhorrence of their crimes; and no reflecting person, with these records before his eyes, would venture to commit iniquity, even if he could be sure to escape eternal misery; any more than a man would, for a trifling advantage, throw himself from a precipice and break his bones, if he could be assured that his life would be preserved: for he would be sensible that he must suffer immense pain, and probably be a cripple all his days.—The Lord over-rules the wickedness of men, (while they are hurried on by their own lusts and Satan's temptations,) to accomplish his holy and righteous purposes.—So depraved is the human heart, that [every] natural affection may degenerate into licentiousness.—What men dignify with the name of love is commonly a sensual inclination, entire selfishness, which often triumphs over conscience and the fear of God, and without pity consigns its object to irreparable disgrace and misery, for the sake of a momentary gratification! How different from that love, which the law of God commands! yea, how contrary to it!—Men's domineering lusts, when restrained by external hindrances, become their tormentors, drink up their spirits, and disorder their bodies; and probably the fury of sinful passions, without any possibility of gratification, will form one dreadful part of the misery of the damned: let the tremendous thought lead every reader to seek their mortification, that by the grace of God they may [never rule in] his heart.—Who can conceive what the state of this world would be, if every sinner's power was equal to his inclination, for the commission of wickedness?—Such plausible villains [as Jonadab] know how to take advantage of the affection, candor, modesty, and unsuspecting confidence of pious persons, for the accomplishment of their own infamous designs: and when iniquity is resolved on, a perfect infatuation takes place, and all probable or certain consequences are forgotten. SCOTT.

He hated her with great hatred, greatly, so the marg. and grew as outrageous in his malice, as he had been in his lust; he basely turned her out of doors by force; nay, as if he now disdained to touch her with his own hands, he ordered his servant to pull her out, and bolt the door after her, v. 17. Now, 1. The innocent, injured lady had reason to resent this as a great affront, and in some respects, (as she says, v. 16.) worse than the former, for nothing could have been done more barbarous, or more disgraceful to her. Had he given her time to compose herself, she might have kept her countenance when she went out, and so have kept her counsel. But to dismiss her thus hurried, thus rudely, obliged her, in her own defence, to proclaim her wrong. 2. We may learn from it, both the malignity of unbridled appetites, and the mischievous consequences of sin; at last, it bites like a serpent. Had he hated the sin, and loathed himself for it, we might have hoped he was penitent: Godly sorrow worketh indignation; (2 Cor. 7: 11.) but to hate the person he had abused, showed that his conscience was terrified, but his heart not at all humbled. See what deceitful pleasures those of the flesh are, how soon they pass away, and turn into loathing; see Ezek. 23:

communicating with one another. One of them frequently serves a whole family, particularly when a father indulges his married children to live with him, or two or more families hire one house. In houses of better fashion these chambers are hung with velvet or damask, from the middle of the wall downwards, are covered and adorned with velvet or damask hangings of white, blue, red, green or other colors (Esth. 1:6.) suspended on hooks, or taken down at pleasure: But the upper part is adorned with stucco, and fret-work, &c. The ceiling is of wainscot, painted, or else panelled with gilt mouldings, and scrolls of the Coran intermixed: (comp. Jer. 22:14.) The floors are of painted tile, or plaster of terrace, and spread with rich carpets, for sitting cross-legged, or lying at length. Along the sides of the wall, a range of narrow beds, or mattrasses, is often placed on these carpets, with damask or velvet bolsters. At one end of each chamber, there is a little gallery, raised 3, 4, or 5 ft. above the floor, with a balustrade in front, and a few steps leading up to it. Here they place their beds; a situation frequently alluded to in the Bible.' [And probably in this v.] See Calm. by Rob. SHAW.

That ministered.] 'Eastern masters do not keep their servants at the distance usual in England. The affairs of the family, the news of the day, and the little incidents of life, are mutually discussed, as by equals.' ROBERTS. The case seems to have been much the same in the times of the patriarchs, and of Moses. ED.

Verses 19, 20.

Tamar went home in the manner, and with all the gestures of an inconsolable mourner. (M. R.) Doubtless her mind was filled with extreme anguish; but perhaps she meant also thus to protest, that though unfortunate she was not criminal.—It seems that Tamar not only shunned society at the time; but also lived all her days a single and retired life. (Gen. 34:31.) SCOTT.

Verse 21.

Amnon's incest was an express violation of the divine law; and to one prohibition it is added, 'they shall be cut off; . . . he shall bear his iniquity.' (Lev. 18:9. 20:17.) Yet the magistrate was not explicitly commanded to put the offender to death. Neither was it enjoined, that he who forced a woman should be put to death, unless she was betrothed; because otherwise he would have been obliged to marry her. (Ex. 22:16, 17. Deut. 22:22—27.) Perhaps these circumstances united with David's excessive paternal tenderness, especially to his eldest son, and with the consciousness of his own guilt, to satisfy his mind in leaving Amnon to the judgment of God. But certainly he ought to have manifested his displeasure in some very decided manner; and this complication of crimes would have justified the severest punishment: but as he neglected his duty, the Lord afterwards took vengeance on Amnon, in a way which added still more to David's domestic trials. (22—33. 1 Sam. 2:29—34.) ID.

22 ¶ And Absalom [b]spake unto his brother Amnon [c]neither good nor bad: for Absalom [d]hated Amnon, because he had forced his sister Tamar.

23 And it came to pass after two full years, B. C. 1030. that Absalom had [e]sheep-shearers in Baal-hazor, which is beside Ephraim: and Absalom [f]invited all the king's sons.

24 And Absalom came to the king, and said, Behold now, thy servant hath sheep-shearers; [g]let the king, I beseech thee, and his servants, go with thy servant.

25 And the king said to Absalom, Nay, my son, let us not all now go, lest we be chargeable unto thee. And he [h]pressed him: howbeit he would not go, but [i]blessed him.

26 Then said Absalom, If not, I pray thee, [k]let my brother Amnon go with us. And the king said unto him, Why should he go with thee?

27 But Absalom pressed him, that he let Amnon and all the king's sons go with him.

28 Now Absalom had commanded his servants, saying, Mark ye now when Amnon's [m]heart is merry with wine, and when I say unto you, Smite Amnon; then kill him, [n]fear not: [*]have not I commanded you? be courageous, and be † valiant.

29 And the [o]servants of Absalom did unto Amnon as Absalom had commanded: then all the king's sons arose, and every man ‡ gat him upon his [p]mule and fled.

30 And it came to pass, while they were in the way, that tidings came to David, saying, Absalom hath slain all the king's sons, and there is not one of them left.

31 Then the king [q]arose, and tare his garments, and lay on the earth; and [r]all his servants stood by with their clothes rent.

32 And [s]Jonadab the son of [t]Shimeah, David's brother, answered and said, Let not my lord suppose that they have slain all the young men the king's sons; for Amnon only is dead: for by the § appointment of Absalom this hath been ‖ determined, from the day that he forced his sister Tamar.

33 Now therefore [u]let not my lord the king take the thing to his heart, to think that all the king's sons are dead: for Amnon only is dead.

34 But [x]Absalom fled. And the young man that kept the watch lifted up his eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came much people by the way of the hill-side behind him.

35 And Jonadab said unto the king, Behold, the king's sons come: ¶ as thy servant said, so it is.

36 And it came to pass, as soon as he had made an end of speaking, that behold, the king's sons came, and lifted up their voice, and wept; and the king also

17 Sins, secret in the commission, afterward become open and public, and the sinners themselves often make them so. The Jewish doctors say, that, on the occasion of this wickedness, a law was made, that a young man and a young woman should never be alone together; for, said they, if the king's daughter be so used, what will become of the children of private men?

We must now leave the criminal to the terrors of his guilty conscience, and inquire what becomes of the poor victim. She bitterly lamented the injury, as a stain to her honor, though no real blemish to her virtue; loathing her own beauty and ornaments, because they had occasioned Amnon's unlawful love; so she went crying for another's sin, v. 19. Retiring to Absalom's house, because he was her own brother, she lived there in solitude and sorrow, in token of her modesty, and detestation of uncleanness. Absalom spoke kindly to her, bid her pass by the injury, for the present, designing himself to revenge it, v. 20. It should seem, by Absalom's question, (Has Amnon been with thee?) that Amnon was notorious for such lewd practices, so that it was dangerous for a modest woman to be with him; this Absalom might know, and yet Tamar be wholly ignorant of it.

V. 21—29. I. David, at the tidings of Amnon's sin, was very wroth, v. 21. But was it enough to be angry? He ought to have punished his son, and put him to open shame; both as a father, and as a king, he had power to do it. But the Sept. here adds these words: But he saddened not the spirit of his son Amnon, because he loved him, because he was his first-born. He fell into Eli's error, whose sons made themselves vile, and he frowned not on them. If Amnon was dear to him, punishing him would have been so much the greater punishment to himself, for his own uncleanness. But he cannot bear the shame those must submit to, who correct that in others, which they are conscious of in themselves, therefore his anger must serve instead of his justice; this hardens sinners, Eccl. 8: 11.

II. How Absalom resented it; and since his father will not punish Amnon, he will; he reckons himself affronted through his sister. Their mother was daughter to a heathen prince, (ch. 3: 3.) which perhaps they were upbraided with sometimes, as children of a stranger; as such a one Absalom thought his sister now treated; and if Amnon thought her fit to be made his harlot, he would think him fit to be made his slave; this enraged him, and nothing less than Amnon's blood will quench his rage. Here we have,

1. The design (v. 23—28.) conceived. Absalom hated Amnon, (v. 22.) and he that hateth his brother, is a murderer already, and, like Cain, is of that wicked one, 1 John 3: 12—15. Absalom's hatred of his brother's crime had been commendable, and he might justly have prosecuted him; but to hate his person, and design his death, was to put a great affront on God, by offering to repair the breach of his seventh commandment by the violation of his sixth, as if they were not all alike sacred. See James 2: 11.

2. The design executed, v. 28, 29. Absalom's entertainment was very plentiful; he resolves the king's sons shall all be merry; at least, he concludes Amnon will be so, for he knew he was apt to drink to excess. But, the orders he gave his servants to mingle Amnon's blood with his wine, were very barbarous. Observe the aggravations of this sin: (1.) He would have Amnon slain, when his heart was merry with wine; as if to destroy both soul and body. What a dreadful surprise has death been to many, whose hearts have been overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness! (2.) His servants must be employed to do it, and so involved in the guilt. What an impious defiance to the divine command, Thou shalt not kill! 'Have not I commanded?' Those servants are ill-taught, (and have wicked masters,) who obey, in contradiction to God: too obsequious, that will damn their souls to please their masters, whose big words cannot secure them from God's wrath. Masters must always command their servants, as those that know they have also a Master in heaven. (3.) He did it in the presence of all the king's sons, of whom it is said, (ch. 8: 18.) they were chief rulers; so it was an affront to public justice, of which they had the administration, and to the king his father whom they represented. 4. There is reason to suspect Absalom did this, not only to revenge his sister's quarrel, but to make way for himself to the throne; which he would stand fair for, if Amnon the eldest son was taken off. Chileab was dead, so Patrick. Now the threatened sword is drawn in David's house, which should not depart from it. (1.) His eldest son falls by it, himself being, by his wickedness, the cause of it, and his father, by his connivance, accessary. (2.) All his sons flee from it in terror, not knowing how far their brother Absalom's bloody design might extend. See what mischief sin makes in families

Verses 32, 33.

It cannot be supposed, that Absalom would make Jonadab his confidant; but being a sagacious man, he had, from some circumstances, or casual expressions, suspected his malicious intentions. (M. R.—Note, 3, 4.) It would, however, have been far more profitable sagacity, to have foreseen these consequences, and to have forwarned and all his servants wept * very sore.

37 But Absalom fled, and went to [y] Talmai, the son of † Ammihud, king of Geshur. And David mourned for his son every day.

38 So Absalom fled, and went to [z] Geshur, and was there three years.

39 And [a] the soul of king David ‡ longed to go forth unto Absalom: for he was [b] comforted concerning Amnon, seeing he was dead.

CHAP. XIV.

Joab instructs a woman of Tekoah, and sends her to David, 1—3. With a feigned tale and artful management she induces him to recall Absalom, 4—20. Joab is sent to bring him to Jerusalem; yet he is not allowed to see the king, 21—24. His beauty, 25, 26. His children, 27. After two years, he prevails with Joab to introduce him to David, 28—33.

NOW [a] Joab the son of Zeruiah perceived that the king's heart was [b] toward Absalom.

2 And Joab sent [c] to Tekoah, and fetched thence a wise woman, and said unto her, I pray thee feign thyself to be a mourner, and put on now [d] mourning apparel, and anoint not thyself with oil, but be as a woman that had a long time mourned for the dead:

3 And come to the king, and speak on this manner unto him. So Joab [e] put the words in her mouth.

4 And when the woman of Tekoah spake to the king, she [f] fell on her face to the ground, and did obeisance, and said, * Help, O king.

5 And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, [g] I am indeed a widow woman, and mine husband is dead.

6 And thy handmaid had two sons, [h] and they two strove together in the field, and there was † none to part them, but the one smote the other, and slew him.

7 And behold, [i] the whole family is risen against thine handmaid, and they said, Deliver him that smote his brother, that we may kill him, for the life of his brother whom he slew; and we will destroy the heir also: and [k] so they shall [l] quench my coal which is left, and shall not leave to my husband neither name nor remainder ‡ upon the earth.

* Heb. with a great weeping greatly.

not be afraid of evil tidings, while they want confirmation, but when we hear the worst, hope the best, at least, hope better. However, this false news gave David as much present affliction, as if it had been true, v. 31. It was well he had grace; he had need enough of it, for he had strong passions.

II. The mistake rectified two ways. 1. By the sly suggestions of Jonadab, David's nephew, v. 32, 33. It is well, if Jonadab was not as guilty of Amnon's death, as of his sin; if we do not our utmost to prevent mischief, we make ourselves accessary to it: such friends do they prove, who are hearkened to as counsellors to do wickedly: he that would not be so kind as to prevent Amnon's sin, neither would he be so kind as to prevent his ruin, when, it should seem, he might have done both. 2. By the safe return of all the king's sons, except Amnon; v. 34, 35. yet, that Amnon was dead, and slain by his own brother, in such a treacherous, malicious, barbarous manner, was enough to put the king, court, and kingdom, into real mourning. Sorrow is never more reasonable, than when there is sin in the case.

III. Absalom's flight from justice, v. 34. The cities of refuge gave no protection to a wilful murderer. He therefore made the best of his way to his mother's relations, and was entertained by his grandfather, Talmai, king of Geshur, (v. 37.) there he was protected three years; (v. 38.) David not demanding him, and Talmai not thinking himself obliged to send him back, unless demanded.

IV. David's uneasiness for his absence. He mourned for Amnon a good while, (v. 37.) but he being past recall, time wore off that grief; he was comforted concerning Amnon: it also wore off too much his detestation of Absalom's sin; instead of loathing him, as a murderer, he longs to go forth to him, v. 39. At first, he could not find in his heart to do justice on him, now he can almost find in his heart to take him into his favor again. This was David's infirmity; something God saw in his heart that made a difference, else we should have thought that he, as much as Eli, honored his sons more than God.

CHAP. XIV. How Absalom threw himself out of his royal father's protection and favor, we read in the foregoing ch. which left him an exile, outlawed, and proscribed; in this, we have the arts used to bring him and his father together again, and how, at last, it was done; which is here recorded, to show the folly of David, in sparing him, and indulging him in his wickedness, for which he was, soon after, severely corrected by his unnatural rebellion.

V. 1—20. Here is, I. Joab's design to get Absalom recalled out of banishment, his crime pardoned, and his attainder reversed, v. 1. Joab made himself very busy in this affair, 1. As a courtier, studious, by all ways possible, to ingratiate himself with his prince, and improve his interest in his favor; he perceived that, the heat of the king's displeasure being over, he still retained his old affection for Absalom, and only wanted a friend to court him to be reconciled, and to contrive how he might do it, without impeaching the honor of his justice. 2. As a friend to Absalom, whom, perhaps, he had a particular kindness for, at least looked upon as the rising sun, to whom it was his interest to recommend himself. He plainly foresaw his father would, at length, be reconciled; and therefore thought he should make both his friends, if instrumental to bring it about. 3. As a statesman concerned for the public welfare. He knew how much Absalom was the darling of the people, and if David should die while he was in banishment, it might occasion a civil war; for it is probable that, though all Israel loved his person, yet they were much divided upon his case. 4. As one who was himself a

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—39. Sensual love is readily changed into hatred, and concupiscence into loathing: nor can it reasonably be expected, that those, who make no scruple of debauching the persons for whom they pretend affection, will feel any remorse at deserting them with cruelty and disdain, at exposing them to shame and contempt, or at leaving them to all the horrors of penury or prostitution; [as is done every day.] Let no one ever expect better treatment from those, who are capable of attempting to seduce them.—But it is better to suffer the greatest wrong, than to commit the least sin, though apparently with impunity and without rebuke.—It is every one's duty to comfort those who are in distress: and generally it is most advisable for injured persons to be quiet, and leave their cause with God.—Often have festive interviews, and seasons of sensual indulgence, been the chosen scenes for assassinations and massacres; and men have been sent into the eternal world from the midst of riot and excess! Such is human nature, left to itself, armed with power, and emboldened by prosperity: what need then have we to pray for converting grace, and to be satisfied, in our inferior stations!—Children are always uncertain comforts: but indulged children will surely prove trials to pious parents, whose foolish fondness induces them to neglect their duty to God: yet parental affection can scarcely be extinguished by any degree of misconduct. But the case of parents is very deplorable, when the children copy their conduct in the crimes which they perpetrate; and when it is nevertheless their duty to punish them with great severity for those very imitations!—Let us not covet that worldly wisdom, which, with all its boasted sagacity, cannot prevent the destruction of those who are counselled by it: but let us seek that heavenly wisdom, which safely leads the possessor, through all the dangerous paths of this life, to the perfect felicity of the eternal world. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—3. Joab perceived David greatly desired to recall Absalom; but did not know how to do it, without disgracing his character and government. He doubtless intended [by the artifice used] to obtain a concession from David, that in some possible cases the punishment of a murderer might be dispensed with; and then to apply it to the case of Absalom. SCOTT.

Verses 6, 7.

Had the case been drawn more similar, it would have betrayed the design, and defeated Joab's purpose: and the state of David's heart rendered it unnecessary to be very exact: for he wanted, not a good reason, but a plausible excuse for following his inclinations, as Joab well knew. SCOTT.

8 And the king said unto the woman, Go to thine house, and [m] I will give charge concerning thee.

9 And the woman of Tekoah said unto the king, My lord, O king, [n] the iniquity be on me, and on my father's house: [o] and the king and his throne be guiltless.

10 And the king said, Whosoever saith ought unto thee, bring him to me, and he shall not touch thee any more.

11 Then said she, I pray thee, [p] let the king remember the LORD thy God, that * thou wouldest not suffer [q] the revengers of blood to destroy any more, lest they destroy my son. And he said, [r] As the LORD liveth, there shall [s] not one hair of thy son fall to the earth.

12 Then the woman said, [t] Let thine handmaid, I pray thee, [u] speak one word unto my lord the king. And he said, [x] Say on.

13 And the woman said, [y] Wherefore then hast thou thought such a thing against the [z] people of God? for the king doth speak this thing as one which is faulty, [a] in that the king doth not fetch home again his banished.

14 For [b] we must needs die, and are [c] as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again: † neither doth [d] God respect any person; yet doth he * devise means, that his banished be not expelled from him.

15 Now therefore that I am come to speak of this thing unto my lord the king, it is because the people have made me afraid: and thy handmaid said, I will now speak unto the king; it may be that the king will perform the request of his handmaid.

16 For the king will hear, to deliver his handmaid out of the hand of the man that would destroy me and my son together out of the inheritance of God.

17 Then thine handmaid said, The word of my lord the king shall now be ‡ comfortable: for [f] as an angel of God, so is my lord the king § to [g] discern good and bad: therefore the LORD thy God will be with thee.

delinquent, by the murder of Abner; and who therefore, whatever favor he could procure to be shown to Absalom, would corroborate his [own] reprieve.

II. His contrivance, by laying somewhat of a parallel case before the king, was done so dexterously by the person he employed, that the king took it for a real case, and gave judgment on it, (as on Nathan's parable,) which being in favor of the criminal, the manager might, by that, discover his sentiments so far, as to venture on its application, and show it was the case of his own family. This, probably, she was instructed not to proceed to, if the king's judgment were severe.

The person employed is not named, but is said to be a woman of Tekoah, a wise woman, that had a quicker wit, and readier tongue, than most of her neighbors, v. 2. and it was requisite the scene should be laid at a distance, that David might not think it strange he had not heard of it before. The truth of the story would be less suspected, when supposed to come from the person's own mouth.

She names not Absalom, nor needed she to name him; David longed so much after him, and had him so much in his thoughts, that he was soon aware whom she meant by his banished. It is true, Absalom's case differed very much from that she had put. But David was too well affected to the cause, to be critical in his remarks on the disparity of the cases; and more desirous than she could be, to bring that favorable judgment to his own son, which he had given concerning hers.

However, she reasons upon it with the king, to persuade him to recall Absalom, pardon, and take him into favor again; and concludes her address, with high compliments to the king, and strong expressions of her assurance that he would do what human race, [fabled to be stolen at first by Prometheus from heaven,] was to be re-kindled on the earth.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 8—11.

It would not have answered the intent of the woman, or of Joab her prompter, had David merely engaged to examine into the case: a present absolute decision in favor of the supposed criminal was the object. The woman therefore, having excited David's compassion, urged her plea with great earnestness; and assured him that she was so satisfied of the goodness of the cause, that she was willing all the guilt, if there were any, should rest on her and her father's house, and not on David or his kingdom. Thus she engaged for what was out of her power; (1 Sam. 28:9, 10.) for the neglect of punishing murder would, notwithstanding, bring guilt on both king and people. (Num. 35:31—34.) She, however, requested him to 'remember the LORD his God:' i. e. to give her the security of an oath, that he would spare and protect her son; and he was prevailed on to grant her unreasonable demand. In this, David acted more according to his feelings than his judgment, and was very precipitate. If the party concerned in the supposed case did not deserve to die, the city of refuge would have afforded him a safe retreat, and a fair trial: (note, Josh. 20:2—6.) and if he merited death, David had no right to dispense with the divine law by protecting him; and moreover he had examined no other witness, than one interested party! SCOTT.

I will give charge concerning thee.] 'This would not do; it was too distant: and she could not by it bring her business to a conclusion; so she proceeds—The iniquity be on me.] Intimating that, if the king should suppose, that not bringing the offender to the assigned punishment might reflect on the administration of justice in the land, she was willing that all blame should attach to her and her family, and the king and his throne be guiltless. Whosoever saith aught unto thee.] Neither did this bring the matter to such a bearing that she could come to a conclusion: which was, to get the king pledged by a solemn promise that all proceedings in the case should be stopped. Remember the Lord Thy God.] Consider, that when God is earnestly requested to show mercy, He does it in the promptest manner; He does not wait till the case is hopeless: The danger to which my son is exposed is imminent; if the king do not decide the business instantly, it may be too late. And he said, As the Lord liveth.] Thus he binds himself by a most solemn promise and oath; and this is what the woman wished to extort. . . . It is very possible the principal facts of this woman's story were real, and Joab found out a person whose circumstances bore a near resemblance to that he wished to represent.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 13—17.

The woman, having thus far carried her point, proceeded, gradually and ambiguously, to apply David's concession to the case of Absalom; and her speech was most artfully devised, so that she might retract, or be more explicit, according as he took it. She intimated that the king's severity to his son was injurious to the people of God; and that he was wanting in his duty to the kingdom, in delaying to recall him: as if Absalom had been so excellent a young man, that all the hopes of Israel centered in him! She represented his flight to Geshur as a banishment, which had already been too severe a punishment of his offence. She pleaded the certainty of death, and the impossibility of recalling the dead to life again; by which she would either insinuate that Amnon would have died in some other way, if Absalom had not slain him; or that the punishment of Absalom would not bring him to life again; or that, as David himself must at length die, it was proper that Absalom should be recalled to succeed him. But whatever she meant, it was nothing to the purpose: for God hath commanded the death of the murderer, which exceedingly tends to the preservation of the life of man, though it cannot raise the dead; and if such an argument were of any force, no malefactor must be put to death! 'When we have a mind to a thing, all reasons seem strong to persuade us to it.' Patrick.—She also pleaded the mercy of God, in sparing, and re-admitting sinful men into his presence and favor, though justly banished from it; in which she seems to have referred to the return of the manslayer to his inheritance, at the death of the high priest.—The marginal reading, (14) 'because God hath not taken away his life, He hath also, &c.' appears to be the proper translation; and it is intimated, that as God had spared Absalom, David ought to pardon him.—But God pardons none who are impenitent; nor any, to the dishonor of his law and justice, or to the encouragement of crimes, and the injury of others. Perhaps she meant to hint, that the people expressed their dissatisfaction with Absalom's banishment so openly, that they made her afraid of an insurrection: but she purposely so confounded the feigned cause of her son with the real cause of Absalom, that part of her address is obscure. While, however, she ventured to censure David for not gratifying himself; she took care repeatedly to give him flattering commendations for his wisdom and goodness, which in such a cause abundantly compensated for the ambiguity of her discourse, and the weakness of her arguments: (Prov. 26:28. 29:5.) and to do her justice, her ingenuity in pleading so bad a cause was admirable. SCOTT.

(14.) Neither doth God respect any person.] 'Heb. velo yissa Elo him nephesh, "and God doth not take away the soul." Sept. "God will receive the soul." Thus the opinion of the separate existence of the soul with God [note, h. Introd. vol. 1, p. 10.] was certainly held by these translators, and was the opinion of the ancient Jews, at least 300 yrs. before the incarnation; about which time this translation was made. The Vulg. has, "Nor does God will the destruction of the soul." God is not the author of death; neither hath He pleasure in the destruction of the living; imitate Him; pardon and recall thy son.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(15—17.) Boothr. places these vs. after v. 11. ED.

18 Then the king answered and said unto the woman, [h] Hide not from me, I pray thee, the thing that I shall ask thee. And the woman said, Let my lord the king now speak.

19 And the king said, Is not the hand [i] of Joab with thee in all this? And the woman answered and said, [k] As thy soul liveth, my lord the king, none can [l] turn to the right hand or to the left from ought that my lord the king hath spoken: for thy servant Joab, he bade me, and [m] he put all these words in the mouth of thine handmaid:

20 To [n] fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing: and my lord is wise, [o] according to the wisdom of an angel of God, [p] to know all things that are in the earth.

[Practical Observations.]

21 ¶ And the king said unto Joab, Behold now, [q] I have done this thing: go therefore, bring the young man Absalom again.

22 And Joab fell to the ground on his face, and bowed himself, and [*] thanked the king: and Joab said, To-day thy servant knoweth that [r] I have found grace in thy sight, my lord, O king, in that the king hath fulfilled the request of was just and kind, both in the one case and the other; for, as if the case had been real, still she pleads for herself and her son, yet meaning Absalom.

Lastly, (1.) David soon suspected the hand of Joab in it. For he could not think such a woman as this would have appealed to him, in a matter of such moment, of her own head. And he knew none so likely to set her on as Joab, a politic man, and a friend of Absalom.

(2.) This the woman very honestly owned; saying 'Thy servant Joab, he bade me. If it be well done, let him have the thanks; if ill, let him bear the blame.' Though she found it very agreeable to the king, yet she would not take the praise to herself, but speaks the truth, and gives us an example never to tell a lie for the concealing of a well-managed scheme; Dare to be true, nothing can need a lie.

V. 21—27. I. Orders are here given to bring back Absalom; the errand on which the woman came to David was so agreeable, and her management of it so very ingenious and surprising, that he was brought into a peculiarly kind humor: Go, (says he to Joab,) bring the young man Absalom again, v. 21. Which may illustrate the methods of divine grace. It is true, God has thoughts of compassion toward poor sinners, not willing that any should perish, yet He is reconciled to them through a Mediator, who intercedes, and to whom he has given orders, Go, bring them again. God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, and He came to this land of our banishment, to bring us to God.

Joab, having received these orders, 1. Thanks the king for doing him the honor to employ him in an affair so universally grateful, v. 22. 2. Defoot even to the crown of his head, there was no blemish in him.

26 And [x] when he polled his head, (for it was at every year's end that he polled it: because the hair was heavy on him, therefore he polled it;) he weighed the hair of his head, at [y] two hundred shekels after the king's weight.

lays not to execute David's orders, v. 23. I see not how David can be justified in suspending the execution of the ancient law, (Gen. 9: 6.) Whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, in which a righteous magistrate ought not to acknowledge even his brethren, or know his own children. God justly made Absalom a scourge to him, whom his foolish pity thus spared. But though he allowed him to return to his own house, he forbade him the court, and would not see him himself, v. 24. Perhaps he had heard something of his conduct, when Joab went to fetch him, which gave him too much reason to think he was not truly penitent; he therefore put him under this mark of his displeasure, that he might be awakened to a sight of his sin, and to sorrow for it, and might make his peace with God; on the first notice of which, no doubt, David would be forward to receive him again into his favor.

II. Occasion taken hence to give an account of Absalom. Nothing is said of his wisdom and piety, though he was the son of such a devout father; parents cannot give grace to their children, though they give them ever so good an education. All that is here said of him, is, 1. That there was not his equal in all Israel for beauty, v. 25. A poor commendation for a man that had nothing else in him valuable. Handsome are they that handsome do. Perhaps his being handsome was one reason why his father was so fond of him, and protected him from justice. Those have reason to fear affliction in their children, who are better pleased with their beauty than with their virtue. 2. That he had a very fine head of hair. Whether it was the length, or color, or extraordinary softness of it, something there was, which made it very valuable, and very much an ornament to him, v. 26.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20. It behooves princes and magistrates to be accessible, and to protect the destitute and oppressed: yet the most amiable dispositions must be regulated by discretion; or they will lead us to improper concessions.—If scruples and fears deter great men from complying with their inclinations; some feigned precedent, some plausible arguments, or some partial illustration, will be devised and speciously suggested, to remove the hindrance. Thus many a one has been led to impose on his own judgment and conscience, and conclude that he could not resist such urgent importunities, and such cogent arguments; that his consent was almost extorted; and that to oblige such kind friends he had passed his word, and could not in honor retract it: while in reality he was overcome by his own inclinations, and only wanted a specious excuse for indulging them.—Let us hence learn, what need we have to adhere closely to our rule of duty; to pray earnestly for the teaching of the Holy Spirit; and to watch against the deceitfulness of our own hearts, the bribery of our passions, and the agreeable poison of adulation.—Sin has so filled the world with misery, that real cases of distress may be found, more pitiable than any which the imagination can feign; and we should readily endeavor to relieve those, who are in trouble: but even compassion, amiable as it is, will not justify our violations of the divine law, or neglect of the important duties of our station. (Ex. 23: 1—3.) With this single exception, alleviating misery is the noblest privilege and employment of the great; who should in this especially 'remember the LORD their God:' not only his authority and their accountableness to Him; but his compassion and mercy to others and to themselves; and his justice and holiness, who in his love to sinners manifests most conspicuously his abhorrence of their crimes.—When most commended for our discernment, we generally act the most foolishly; for those very praises cloud the understanding, and pervert the judgment. We deem it unnecessary for persons, of such acknowledged wisdom as we are, to waste time in nice distinctions; we can scarcely refuse to speak comfortably to them, who speak so agreeably to us: and hence extravagant commendations lead to self-deception, and entangle all parties in the net of the great deceiver of our fallen race. SCOTT.

Verses 21, 22.

David was willing to suppose that his oath, to spare the woman's son, obliged him to recall Absalom, who was the person really intended; though he could not but perceive the insufficiency of her arguments, and the disparity of the cases. As a favor, therefore, he gave Joab permission to fetch home Absalom; and Joab appeared as thankful to the king for allotting him this service, as if the most expensive kindness had been done him. There was much of the courtier in this; but it was far distant from godly sincerity! SCOTT.

Verse 24.

David probably meant to quiet his own conscience, and to silence the censures of others, or to show his abhorrence of murder, by laying Absalom under some tokens of disgrace, and by denying himself the pleasure of seeing him. This might also be intended to humble Absalom: but it entirely failed of producing that effect. SCOTT.

Verses 25—27.

(M. R.—15:1—6. 1 K. 1:5, 6.) 'It is not certain that he cut his hair ones a year: for the words in the Hebrew are, 'from the end of days mar; she was a woman of a fair countenance.

B. C. 1025. 28 ¶ So Absalom dwelt two full years in Jerusalem, and saw not the king's face.

29 Therefore Absalom sent for Joab, to have sent him to the king; [b] but he would not come to him: and when he sent again the second time, he would not come.

30 Therefore he said unto his servants, See, Joab's field is near [*] mine, and he hath barley there; [c] go and set it on fire. [d] And Absalom's servants set the field on fire.

31 Then Joab arose, and came to Absalom unto his house, and said unto him, Wherefore have thy servants set my field on fire?

32 And Absalom answered Joab, Behold, I sent unto thee, saying, Come hither, that I may send thee to the king, to say, Wherefore am I come from Geshur? [e] it had been good for me to have been there still: now therefore let me see the king's face; and if there be any iniquity in me, let him kill me.

33 So Joab came to the king, and told him: and when he had called for Absalom, he came to the king, and bowed himself on his face to the ground before the king: and the king [f] kissed Absalom.

This notice is taken of it, not as the hair of a Nazarite, but as the hair of a beau. He let it grow, till it was a burden to him, nor would he cut it, as long as ever he could bear it. As pride feels no cold, so it feels no heat; and that which feeds and gratifies it, is not complained of, though very uneasy. When he did poll it at certain times, for ostentation he had it weighed, that it might be seen how much it excelled other men's; and it weighed 200 shekels, which some reckon to be 3 lbs. 2 oz. of our weight; and with the oil and powder, especially if it were powdered (as Josephus says the fashion then was) with gold-dust, Patrick thinks it is not at all incredible that it should weigh so much. This fine hair proved his halter, ch. 18:9. 3. That his family began to be built up. It was, probably, a good while before he had a child; and then, despairing of having one, he set up that pillar, ch. 18:18. to bear up his name; but afterward he had three sons, and one daughter, v. 27. [called Tamar, a date-tree, note, Ex. 15:27.] Or, perhaps, these sons, while he was hatching his rebellion, were all cut off by the righteous hand of God, and thereupon he set up that monument.

V. 28—33. Three years, Absalom had been an exile with his father-in-law, and now, two years, a prisoner at large in his own house, and, in both, better dealt with than he deserved; yet his spirit was still unhumbled, his pride unmortified, and, instead of being thankful his life is spared, he thinks himself sorely wronged that he is not restored to all his places at court. Had he truly repented, his distance from the gaieties of the court, and his solitude and retirement in his own house, especially being in Jerusalem the holy city, would have been very agreeable. If a murderer must live, yet let him be for ever a recluse. But he longs to see the king's face, pretending it was because he loved him, but really because he wanted an opportunity to supplant him. This snake cannot sting again, till he be warmed in his father's bosom. He gained this point, not by pretended submissions and promises of reformation, but (would you think it?) by insults and injuries.

1. Once and again, he sent to Joab to come and speak with him, for he durst not go to him; but Joab would not come, (v. 29.) probably, because Absalom had not owned his kindness in bringing him to Jerusalem, so gratefully as he thought he should have done; proud men take every service done them for a debt. One would have thought a person in Absalom's circumstances would have sent to Joab a kindly message, and offered him a large gratuity; courtiers expect it: instead of this, he insolently and strangely bids his servants set Joab's corn-fields on fire; (v. 30.) as spiteful a thing as he could do. Samson could not think of a greater injury to the Philistines. God, by afflictions, brings those to Him, that kept at a distance from Him. Absalom was obliged by the law to make restitution, (Ex. 22:6.) yet we do not find he offered, or Joab demanded it. And now Joab (perhaps frightened at the surprising boldness and fury of Absalom, and apprehensive he had made an interest in the people strong enough to bear him out in the most daring things, else he would never have done this) not only puts up with this injury, but goes on his errand. See what some men can do, by threats, and carrying things with a high hand.

2. By his insolent message (for I can call it no better) to the king, he recovered his place at court, to see the king's face, i. e. to become a privy counsellor, Esth. 1:14. (1.) He undervalued the favor showed him, in recalling him from banishment, and restoring him to his own house and that in Jerusalem; Wherefore am I come from Geshur? He will not own there was any iniquity in him, insinuating therefore that he had been wronged in the rebuke he had been under. He defies the king's justice, 'Let him kill me, if he can find in his heart;' knowing he loved him too well to do it. (2.) Yet with this message he carried his point, v. 33. David's strong affection for him, construed all this to be the language of a great respect to his father, and an earnest desire of his favor, when, alas, it was any thing but that. See how easily wise and good men may be imposed on by their own children that design ill, especially when blindly fond. Did the bowels of a father prevail to reconcile David to an impenitent son, and shall penitent sinners question the compassion of Him who is the Father of mercy? If Ephraim bemoan himself, God soon bemoans him, with all the kind expressions of a fatherly tenderness; He is a dear son, and a pleasant child, Jer. 31:20.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21—33. In our treatment of children or others who have greatly offended, every method should be used, which has a tendency to mortify pride, and to bring them to repentance; and in aiming at this important object, the feelings of our hearts must be repressed. But when high rank, early indulgence, impunity in crimes, flattering commendations, personal accomplishments, and popular favor, concur to increase the natural haughtiness of the human heart; and when the Lord leaves a man to himself, it is inconceivable to what a pitch of arrogance and insolence he will arrive.—But all this is the forerunner of destruction: and when parents or rulers countenance such imperious characters, they will soon experience the most fatal effects.—The Lord grant unto us the inward beauty of holiness, and the adorning of a meek and quiet spirit: for 'favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain:' and those only, who fear the Lord, are truly excellent and happy.

Verses 28, 29.

Perhaps Absalom was not only forbidden to visit his father; but confined to his own house and its environs, and not allowed to go abroad. (1 K. 2:36—46.) Thus he would be greatly embarrassed in his ambitious projects: and this might be one reason of his impatient desire of being reconciled to David, and enjoying his full liberty; and also of being freed from the disgrace of his present situation, which would hinder many from attaching themselves to him. He seems, however, to have been secretly active in forming a party, even at this time: and either he had not favored Joab for his former services, according to his expectations; or Absalom's popularity and ambition made that sagacious politician regard him as a dangerous person, with whom he did not wish to form any further connections; so that he declined coming to him. SCOTT.

Verses 30—33.

Absalom's injurious and hectoring treatment of so considerable a person as Joab; and his arrogant message to David, almost vindicating his conduct and demanding justice; plainly showed his character and intentions, his confidence in the favor of the people, and the ill-judged lenity of his father. This aggravated David's sin and folly in receiving him into full favor, in the manner he did; and which would give him access, without restraint, to all those, who before were reserved, or afraid of showing their attachment to him. CHAP. XV.

Absalom, by fair speeches and affected courtesy, steals the hearts of the people, 1—6. Under pretence of a vow, he obtains leave to go to Hebron, where he raises rebellion, 7—12. David hearing it retires from Jerusalem, 13—18. Ittai the Gittite faithfully adheres to him, and the people weep over him, 91—23. Zadok and Abiathar are sent back with the ark, 24—29. David and his company ascend mount Olivet weeping, 30. Hearing that Ahithophel had joined Absalom, he prays that his counsel may be turned into foolishness, 31. Hushai is sent back with instructions, 32—37.

AND it came to pass after this, that [a]Absalom prepared him chariots, and horses, and fifty men to run before him.

2 And Absalom [b]rose up early, and stood beside the way of the gate: and it was so, that when any man that had a controversy *came to the king for judgment, then Absalom called unto him, and said, Of what city art thou? And he said, Thy servant is of one of the tribes of Israel.

3 And Absalom said unto him, See, [c]thy matters are good and right; but †there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee.

4 Absalom said moreover, [d]Oh, that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and [d]I would do him justice!

5 And it was so, that when any man came nigh to him to do him obeisance, he put forth his hand, and [f]took him, and [g]kissed him.

6 And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment: so Absalom [h]stole the hearts of the men of Israel.

B. C. 1021. 7 ¶ And it came to pass after [i]forty years, that Absalom said unto the king, I pray thee, [k]let me go and [l]pay my vow, which I have CHAP. XV. Absalom's name signifies the peace of his father, yet he proves his greatest trouble; so often are we disappointed in our expectations from the creature. The sword, entailed on David's house, had hitherto been among his children, now it begins to be drawn against himself, with this aggravation, that he may thank himself for it, for had he done justice on the murderer, he had prevented the traitor. The story of Absalom's rebellion begins with this ch. but we must go over three or four more before we see the end of it. Now the word of God was fulfilled, that He would raise up evil against him out of his own house, ch. 12: 10.

V. 1—6. Absalom is no sooner restored to his place at court, than he aims [the graceless and ungrateful wretch] to be in the throne. Perhaps, he valued himself on being the son of a king's daughter, and despised his father, who was but the son of Jesse. His mother was the daughter of a heathen king, which made him the less concerned for the peace of Israel. David, in this unhappy issue of that marriage, smarted for being unequally yoked with an unbeliever. Two things recommend a man to popular esteem; greatness, and goodness.

I. Absalom looks great, v. 1. He on a horse, his father using a mule. The people desired a king like the nations; and such a one Absalom will be. Samuel had foretold this would be the manner of the king; (1 Sam. 8: 11.) and this is Absalom's manner. David connives at it as designed only to grace his court. Those parents know not what they do, who indulge a proud humor in their children; I have seen more young people ruined by pride, than by any one lust whatsoever.

II. Absalom will seem very good too, but with a very bad design. Had he proved himself a good son, and a good subject, and set himself to serve his father's interest, he had done his present duty, and showed himself worthy of future honors, after his father's death. Those that know how to obey well, know how to rule. Those are good indeed, that are good in their own place, not that pretend how good they will be in other people's places. But this is all the goodness we find in Absalom.

He had all the pomp and pleasure he could wish; yet this will not content him, unless he have power too. We read not of his wisdom, virtue, or learning in the laws, nor had he given any proofs of his love to justice, but the contrary: yet he wishes he were a judge, v. 4. Note, Those are commonly most ambitious of preferment, that are least fit for it; the best qualified are the most modest and self-diffident.

Had he humbly petitioned his father to employ him in the administration of justice, and studied to qualify himself for it, (according to the rule, Ex. 18: 21.) no doubt, he had been sure of the next judge's place that fell; but this is too mean a post for his proud spirit. It is below him to be subordinate, though to the king his father; he must be supreme, or nothing. He wants to be such a judge, that every man who has any cause, shall come to him.

To gain the power he aims at, he endeavors to instil into the people's minds,

1. A bad opinion of the present administration. He got round him all he could, that had business at the council-board, inquired what their business was; and, (1.) Upon a slight and general inquiry into their cause, pronounced it good; Thy matters are right. A fit man indeed to be a judge, who would give judgment upon hearing one side only! He has a bad cause indeed, that cannot put a good color on it, when he himself has the telling of it. But, (2.) He told them, it was to no purpose to appeal to the throne, There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. The king is himself old, and past business; or so taken up with his devotions, that he never minds business; (his sons were so addicted to their pleasures, that, though they had the name of chief rulers, they took no care of the affairs committed to them;) he further seems to insinuate, what a great loss there was of him, while banished and confined, and how much the public suffered by it. Even David himself, the best of kings, and his administration, could not escape the worst of censures. They that aim to usurp, cry out of grievances, and pretend to design nothing but the redress of them: as Absalom here.

2. A good opinion of his own fitness to rule. He recommends himself, (1.) As very diligent; he rose early, and appeared in public, as one mightily concerned to see justice done, and public business despatched. (2.) As very inquisitive and desirous to be acquainted with every one's case. He would know of what city every one was, that came for judgment, that he might inform himself concerning every part of the kingdom, and the state of it, v. 2. (3.) As very familiar and humble. If any Israelite offered to do obeisance to him, he took him, and embraced him as a friend. No man's conduct could be more condescending, while his heart was as proud as Lucifer's. He knew what a grace it puts on greatness, to be affable and courteous, and how much it wins on common people: had he been sincere in it, it had been his praise; but to fawn on the people, that he might betray them, was abominable hypocrisy. Ps. 10: 9, 10.

V. 7—12. We have here the breaking out of Absalom's rebellion, which he had long been contriving; after 40 years, v. 7. not from David's beginning his reign, then it would fall in the last year of his life, which is not probable, but either from his first anointing by Samuel, 7 years before, or rather, (I think,) from the people's desiring a king, and the first change of the government into a monarchy; which might be about 10 years before David began to reign; it is fitly dated thence, to show that the same restless spirit was still working, and they still given to change: as fond now of a new man, as then of a new model. So it fell about the 30th year of David's reign, Absalom's plot being now ripe for execution.

I. The place he chose for the rendezvous of his party, was Hebron; the place where he was born, and where his father began his reign, and contin-

'stole the hearts of the men of Israel.' (Rom. 16:17—20.) He did not gain their hearts by eminent services, or by a wise and virtuous conduct. But he affected to look great, as heir to the crown; and yet to be very condescending, and affable to his inferiors: he pretended a great regard to their interests, and threw out artful insinuations against David's administration: Absalom suggested, that if he could be judge, suits should not then be so tedious, expensive, and partially decided as they were. This he confirmed by rising early and by apparent application; though it was to other people's business, and not to his own duty: and by such sinister arts, united with his personal attractions, magnificence, and address, he imposed upon multitudes all over the land, to prefer so worthless a character to the wise, righteous, and pious David!—Others of the king's sons were employed in public business, but Absalom seems not to have had any place. (8:15—18.) This might offend him; and his artifices tended to alienate the people from his brethren, as well as from his father.—The chariots and horsemen of Absalom, being a deviation from the divine law, should not have been allowed by David on any account: (8:4. Deut. 17:16. 1 K. 1:5, 6.) and indeed he might easily have foreseen the consequences of Absalom's ostentation, and should at once have restrained it. Verses 7—9.

The era, from which the '40 years' here mentioned should be computed, cannot easily be assigned; nor are any of the conjectures of learned men on the subject fully satisfactory. The most approved seems to be, that they must be reckoned from the time of David's anointing by Samuel to the kingdom: yet that, being a private transaction, would scarcely have been referred to in a public computation; no other events are dated from that era; the subsequent history has no apparent connection with it; and indeed it would fix Absalom's rebellion more early in David's reign, than it seems to have occurred. —It is evident, that Josephus read four years, which he dates from Absalom's reconciliation; (a very proper time for his artful schemes to produce their effects:) and this seems to be the true reading, from which a trivial error, easily made, was fallen into by some very ancient transcriber.—Absalom knew his father would be pleased to sup

15 And the king's servants said unto the king, Behold, thy servants are ready to do whatsoever my lord the king shall appoint.

16 And the king went forth, and all his household after him. And the king left ten women, which were concubines, to keep the house.

17 And the king went forth, and all the people after him, and tarried in a place that was far off.

18 And all his servants passed on beside him; and all the Cherethites, and all the Pelethites, and all the Gittites, six hundred men which came after him from Gath, passed on before the king.

19 Then said the king to Ittai the Gittite, Wherefore goest thou also with us? return to thy place, and abide with the king: for thou art a stranger, and also an exile.

20 Whereas thou camest but yesterday, should I this day make thee go up and down with us? seeing I go whither I may, return thou, and take back thy brethren: mercy and truth be with thee.

21 And Ittai answered the king, and said, As the LORD liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be.

22 And David said to Ittai, Go and pass over. And Ittai the Gittite passed over, and all his men, and all the little ones that were with him.

23 And all the country wept with a loud voice, and all the people passed over: the king also himself passed over the brook Kidron, and all the people passed over, toward the way of the wilderness.

24 And lo Zadok also, and all the Levites were with him, bearing the ark of the covenant of God: and they set down the ark of God; and Abiathar went up, until all the people had done passing out of the city.

25 And the king said unto Zadok, Carry back the ark of God into the city: if I shall find favour in the eyes of the LORD, he will bring me again, and shew me both it, and his habitation:

26 But if he thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him.

27 The king said also unto Zadok the priest, Art not thou a seer? return into the city in peace, and your two sons with you, Ahimaaz thy son, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar.

28 See, I will tarry in the plain of the wilderness, until there come word from you to certify me.

29 Zadok therefore and Abiathar carried the ark of God again to Jerusalem: and they tarried there.

30 And David went up by the ascent of mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered, and he went barefoot: and all the people that was with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went up.

31 And one told David, saying, Ahithophel is among the conspirators with Absalom. And David said, O LORD, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness.

32 And it came to pass, that when David was come to the top of the mount, where he worshipped God, behold, Hushai the Archite came to meet him with his coat rent, and earth upon his head:

33 Unto whom David said, If thou passest on with me, then thou shalt be a burden unto me:

34 But if thou return to the city, and say unto Absalom, I will be thy servant, O king; as I have been thy father's servant hitherto, so will I now also be thy servant: then mayest thou for me defeat the counsel of Ahithophel.

35 And have there not with thee Zadok and Abiathar the priests? therefore it shall be, that what thing soever thou shalt hear out of the king's house, thou shalt tell it to Zadok and Abiathar the priests.

36 Behold, they have there with them their two sons, Ahimaaz Zadok's son, and Jonathan Abiathar's son; and by them ye shall send unto me every thing that ye can hear.

37 So Hushai David's friend came into the city, and Absalom came into Jerusalem.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The ostentation of emulating or exceeding superiors in external pomp, is an evidence of a narrow mind, a weak judgment, and a depraved heart. It is, however, the common folly and ruin of indulged children, and frequently prepares the way for the most atrocious crimes. The very first appearance, therefore, of this affectation should be repressed by parents, with decision, and even with severity, if they would prevent the ruin of their families. Such is human nature, that the arts and attainments of the fawning sons of ambition go much further in gaining the favor of the multitude, than wisdom and justice, truth and piety, or the most important and long continued services! This is the old hackneyed way for men, destitute of conscience or honor, to wind themselves into important stations; and yet it is as much practised, and as little suspected, as if it were quite a new discovery!—No wise and good man, therefore, should on any account promise himself the continuance of popular favor, or be cast down if he meet with treachery and ingratitude: yet, in general, we may perceive the righteousness of God, in the basest treatment which we can receive from man; and may thence be reminded to humble ourselves before Him, and to expect all our happiness from Him alone.—No villany can be termed complete, which is not disguised under the mask of religion; especially in those times, when the profession of godliness is treated with general respect. Pious persons are glad to see others, and particularly those whom they most love, appear to be religious, and are not apt to suspect them of hypocrisy: and this gives occasion to the most scandalous and pernicious deceptions.—The policy of wicked men and the subtlety of Satan are exerted to the utmost, in drawing in respectable persons to give an unintended and unsuspected countenance to the basest designs; by which, opinions, principles, and practices acquire a degree of regard, to which they are not at all entitled, and which they would not otherwise have obtained: but none so much strengthen the hands of profligates or infidels, as apostates from a religious profession. pose he paid any regard to religion; and therefore he cloaked his intended treason and parricide, with hypocrisy. (Gen. 27:21—23.) SCOTT.

(7.) Forty years.] Dr. A. Clarke has suggested, that two mss. collated by Dr. Kennicott, have days instead of years, and that this may be the true reading; but should it be four years, as the Syr. and Arab. with Josephus and Theodoret have it, then they may be dated from the time of his slaying Amnon—after which, see ch. 13:38. he was 3 yrs. at Geshur. The conspiracy would then be a year after his return. ED.

Spies having been previously sent into all parts of the land, to sound the inclinations of the people, and to prepare the way; when the design was ripe for execution, trumpeters were sent after them: that, when the signal was given, the spies might, through all the tribes of Israel, proclaim Absalom king, without expressly avowing the treason, or saying whether David was dead, or had resigned, or had admitted Absalom to share the authority. Thus, while David's loyal subjects would hesitate in uncertainty, Absalom's party became formidable. SCOTT.

Verse 12.

(M. R.) Bath-sheba was daughter to Eliam, and Eliam was son to Ahithophel; (11:3. 23:34.) it has therefore been thought that he was her grandfather, and resented the dishonor done to his family. In many things he resembled Judas the traitor, and may even be said to have typified him. (Ps. 41:9. 55:12—15, 20, 21. 109.2—20. John 13: 18—30. Acts 1:16—18.)

Verses 13—15.

It is most probable, that some of the 200 men, who 'went in their simplicity,' sent David word concerning the conspiracy; and also salem, [c] Arise, and let us flee; for we shall not else escape from Absalom: make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly, and * bring evil upon us, [d] and smite the city with the edge of the sword.

call to mind the arts Absalom had used to inveigle them, and perhaps reflected on it with regret, that he had not done more to counterwork him, and secure his own interest, which he had been too confident of. Note, It is the wisdom of princes, to make sure of the hearts of their subjects; for if they have them, they have their purses, arms, all, at their service.

II. The alarm this gave David, and the resolutions he came to, thereupon. We may well imagine him in a manner thunder-struck. Well might he say with Cæsar, What, thou, my son? Let not parents raise their hopes too high from their children, lest they be disappointed. David, consulting only with God and his own heart, determined immediately to quit Jerusalem, v. 14. 1. As a penitent, submitting to the rod. Conscience now reminded him of his sin in the matter of Uriah, and this sentence for it, that evil should rise against him out of his own house. Thus he accepts the punishment of his iniquity. Or, 2. As a politician. Jerusalem was a great city, but not tenable; it should seem, by David's prayer, (Ps. 51: 18.) its walls were not built, much less was it regularly fortified; it was too large to be garrisoned by so small a force as he had now with him; he had reason to fear the generality of the inhabitants were too well-affected to Absalom; should he fortify himself there, he might lose the country, in which, especially among those that lay farthest from Absalom's tampering, he hoped to have the most friends. And he was loth to make Jerusalem the seat of war, and expose it to the calamities of a siege; he will rather quit it tamely to the rebels. Note, Good men, when they suffer themselves, care not how few are involved with them in suffering.

III. His hasty flight from Jerusalem. His servants agreed to the measures he took, faithfully adhered to him, (v. 15.) and assured him of their inviolable allegiance. Whereupon, 1. He went out of Jerusalem himself on foot, while his son Absalom had chariots and horses. It is not always the best man, nor the best cause, that makes the best figure. Thus he chose to do, to abase himself so much the more under God's hand, and in condescension to his friends and followers, with whom he would walk, in token that he would live and die with them. 2. He took his household with him, that he might protect them in this day of danger, and they be a comfort to him in this day of grief. Masters of families, in their greatest frights, must not neglect their households. Ten women, that were concubines, he left behind, to keep the house, thinking the weakness of their sex, their age and relation to him, would protect them; but God overruled this for the fulfilling of his word. 3. He took his life-guard with him, or band of pensioners; the Cherethites and Pelethites, under the command of Benaiah; and the Gittites, under the command of Ittai, v. 18. These Gittites seem to have been, by birth, Philistines of Gath, who came, a regiment of them, 600 in all, to enter themselves in David's service, having known him in Gath, and being greatly in love with him for his virtue and piety, and having embraced the Jews' religion. David made them of his body-guard, and they adhered to him in his distress. The Son of David found not so great faith in Israel as in a Roman centurion, and a woman of Canaan. 4. As many as would, of the people of Jerusalem, he took with him, and made a halt at some distance from the city, to draw them up, v. 17. He compelled none; they whose hearts were with Absalom, to Absalom let them go, and so shall their doom be, they will soon have enough of him. Christ enlists none but volunteers.

IV. His discourse with Ittai the Gittite. 1. David dissuaded him from going with him, v. 19, 20. willing to try whether he were hearty for him, and not inclined to Absalom. If he were no more than a soldier of fortune, (as we say,) he would be for that side which would pay and prefer him best; and to that side let him go. If faithful, yet David would not have him exposed to the fatigues and perils he now counted upon. Generous souls are more concerned at the share others have in their troubles, than at their own. Ittai shall therefore be dismissed with a blessing; a very proper, pious farewell, when we part with a friend, 'Mercy and truth be with thee, and then thou art safe, and mayest be easy, wherever thou art.' David's dependence was on the mercy and truth of God, for comfort and happiness, both for himself and his friends. See Ps. 61: 7. 2. Ittai bravely resolves not to leave him, v. 21. and he confirms his resolution with an oath, that he might not be tempted to break it: such an esteem has he for his wisdom and goodness, which were still the same, that, whatever comes of it, he will never leave him. Note, That is a friend indeed, who loves at all times, and will adhere to us in adversity. Thus should we cleave to the Son of David, with full purpose of heart, that neither life nor death shall separate us from his love.

V. The common people's sympathy with David in his affliction. When he and his attendants passed over the brook Kidron, (the very same brook represented it as extremely formidable. It must indeed have been expected, that the conspirators would act in the most decided manner: and though Jerusalem was a well fortified city, yet it might not be stored with a garrison or provisions for a siege. It does not appear that David's measures were impolitic, or that his friends thought them so. SCOTT.

(13.) The hearts of Israel are after Absalom.] 'Several reasons are given, in trying to account for this general defection. 1. David was old and afflicted, and could not well attend to the administration of justice. 2. It does appear that the king did not attend to the affairs of state; and that there were no properly appointed judges in the land, (see v. 3.) 3. Joab's power was overgrown; he was wicked and insolent, oppressive to the people, and David was afraid to execute the laws against him. 4. There were still some partisans of Saul, who thought the crown not fairly obtained by David. 5. David was under God's displeasure (for adultery and murder), who let his enemies loose against him. 6. There are always troublesome and disaffected men under every government, who can never rest [who, from conceit, a spirit of contradiction, or party spirit, that poison of free states, oppose every thing,] or are ever hoping [some selfish advantage] from a change. 7. Absalom appeared to be the real, and was the undisputed heir to the throne: David could not live long, and most people are more disposed [from the love of novelty] to hail the beams of the rising, than exult in those of the setting sun. No doubt some of these causes operated; and perhaps most of them exerted less or more influence in this most scandalous business.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 24—29.

Abiathar was the high priest: yet Zadok, of the family of Eleazar,

24 ¶ And lo, [q] Zadok also, and all the Levites were with him, [r] bearing the ark of the covenant of God: and they set down the ark of God; and Abiathar went up until all the people had done passing out of the city.

25 And the king said unto Zadok, [s] Carry back the ark of God into the city: if I shall find favor in the eyes of the LORD, [t] he will bring me again, and show me both it and his [u] habitation.

26 But if he thus say, I [v] have no delight in thee; behold here am I, [x] let him do to me as seemeth good unto him.

27 The king said also unto Zadok the priest, Art not thou [y] a seer? [z] return into the city in peace, and your two sons with you, Ahimaaz thy son, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar.

28 See, [a] I will tarry in the plain of the wilderness, until there come word from you to certify me.

29 Zadok therefore and Abiathar carried the ark of God again to Jerusalem: and they tarried there.

30 And David went up by [b] the ascent of mount Olivet, *and wept as he went up, and had [c] his head covered; and he went [d] barefoot: and all the people that was with him covered every man his head, and they went up, [e] weeping as they went up.

Christ passed over, when He entered on his sufferings, John 18: 1.) toward the way of the wilderness, which lay between Jerusalem and Jericho, all the country wept with a loud voice, v. 23. Cause enough there was for weeping. Parents that are abused and ruined by their own children, merit the tender sympathy of their friends, as much as any of the sons or daughters of affliction. To see their own prince, too, thus wronged, who had been so great a blessing to their land, and had done nothing to forfeit the affections of his people; to see him in this distress, and themselves unable to help him, might well draw floods of tears.

V. 24—30. Here is, I. The fidelity of the priests and Levites. They knew David's great affection to them and their office, notwithstanding his failings; the method Absalom took to gain people's affections, made no impression on them; he had little religion in him, therefore they steadily adhered to David; Zadok, Abiathar, and all the Levites, if he go, will accompany him, and take the ark, that, by it, they might ask counsel of God for him, v. 24. Note, They that are friends to the ark in their prosperity, shall find it a friend to them in their adversity. Formerly, David would not rest, till he had found a resting place for the ark; and now, if the priests may have their mind, the ark shall not rest, till David returns to his rest.

II. David's dismission of them back into the city, v. 25, 26. Abiathar was high priest, (1 K. 2: 35.) but Zadok his assistant; he attended the ark most closely, while Abiathar was active in public business, v. 24. Therefore David directs his speech to Zadok, and an excellent speech it is, and shows him to be in a very good frame under his affliction, and that still he holds fast his integrity.

1. He is very solicitous for the safety of the ark; Note, It argues a good principle, to be more concerned for the church's prosperity, than for our own; to prefer Jerusalem before our chief joy; (Ps. 137: 6.) the success of the Gospel, and the flourishing of the church, above our own wealth, credit, ease, and safety, even when they are most in hazard.

2. He is very desirous to return to the enjoyment of the privileges of God's house. Note, Gracious persons measure their comforts and conveniences in this world, by the opportunity they give them of communion with God. Hezekiah wishes for the recovery of his health, that he might go up to the house of the Lord, Isa. 38: 22.

3. He is very submissive to the holy will of God, concerning the issue of his present dark dispensation. He hopes the best, (v. 25.) and hopes for it from the favor of God, which he looks upon to be the fountain of all good. Observe with what satisfaction and holy complacency he speaks of the divine disposal. Note, It is our interest, as well as duty, cheerfully to acquiesce in the will of God, whatever befalls us. That we may not complain of what is, let us see God's hand in all events; and that we may not be afraid of what shall be, let us see all events in God's hand.

III. The confidence David put in the priests, to serve his interest to the utmost of their power, in his absence. He calls Zadok a seer, (v. 27.) that is, a wise man, a man that can see into business, and discern time and judgment. One friend that is a seer, in such an exigence as this, was worth twenty that were not so quick-sighted. For the settling of a private correspondence with the priests in his absence, he appoints Ahimaaz and Jonathan, whose coat, it might be hoped, would be their protection, and of whose prudence and faithfulness, probably, he had had experience. He would encamp in the plain of the wilderness, till he heard from them, (v. 28.) and then move according to the information and advice they should send him. Hereupon, they returned to the city, to wait the event; it was pity any disturbance should be given to a state so happy as this was, when the prince and the priests had such an entire affection for, and confidence in each other.

IV. The melancholy posture David and his men put themselves into, when, at the beginning of their march, they went up the mount of Olives, v. 30. David himself, as a deep mourner, covered his head and face for shame and blushing, went barefoot, as a prisoner or a slave, and for mortification, and went weeping. (1.) He could not but weep, to think that his son would thus lift up the heel against him. (2.) There was much of the displeasure of his God in it; this infused the wormwood and gall, Lam. 3: 19. His sin was ever before him, (Ps. 51: 3.) but never so plain, nor ever appearing so black, as now. He never wept thus when Saul hunted him, but a wounded conscience makes troubles lie heavy, Ps. 38: 4. 2. When David wept, all his company wept likewise. It is our duty to weep with those that weep, especially our superiors, and betters; for, if this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? To prevent suffering with sinners, let us sorrow with them.

V. 31—37. Nothing, it seems, appeared to David more threatening in Absalom's plot, than that Ahithophel was in it. Absalom was himself no politician, but Ahithophel would be the more dangerous, because he had been, all along, acquainted with David's counsels and affairs: if therefore he can be baffled, Absalom is as good as routed, and the head of the conspiracy cut off. This David endeavors to do,

1. By prayer. When he heard Ahithophel was in the plot, he lifted up his heart in prayer, Lord, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness, v. 31. He prays not against Ahithophel's person, but against his counsel, that, though a wise man, he might, at this time, give foolish counsel; or, if he gave wise counsel, that it might be rejected as was more noticed than he, as more favored by David; for Eli's family was gradually declining. David's frame of spirit was excellent on this trying occasion: and his language beautifully humble, resigned, and pious.—It is not certain whether Zadok was endued with the Spirit of prophecy, or whether he sometimes inquired of the Lord in the place of the high priest; or whether David only meant to say, that he was a person of remarkable discernment and penetration.

Verse 30.

These were expressions of David's self-abasement, and sorrow for his sins, and for the miseries which he had brought on himself, on his family, and people. He thus 'humbled himself under the mighty hand of God,' which he saw lifted up against him: and the people joined him with the same tokens of godly sorrow and repentance.

Stratagems of war are lawful [if war itself be so]; for an enemy

34 But if thou [o]return to the city, and say unto Absalom, I will be thy servant, O king; [p]as I have been thy father's servant hitherto, so will I now also be thy servant; [q]then mayest thou for me defeat the counsel of Ahithophel.

35 And hast thou not there with thee Zadok and Abiathar the priests? therefore it shall be, that what thing soever thou shalt hear out of the king's house, [r]thou shalt tell it to Zadok and Abiathar the priests.

36 Behold they have there with them [s]their two sons, Ahimaaz, Zadok's son, and Jonathan, Abiathar's son; and by them ye shall send unto me every thing that ye can hear.

37 So Hushai David's [t]friend came into the city, and [u]Absalom came into Jerusalem.

CHAP. XVI.

Ziba imposes on David, and obtains a grant of Mephibosheth's estate, 1—4. Shimei a Benjamite curses and slanders David, who bears it humbly and meekly, 5—14. Hushai insinuates himself into Absalom's counsels, 15—19. By Ahithophel's advice, Absalom openly goes in to his father's concubines, 20—23.

AND when David was a [a]little past the top of the hill, behold, [b]Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth met him [c]with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and an hundred bunches of raisins, and an hundred of [d]summer fruits, and [e]a bottle of wine.

2 And the king said unto Ziba, [f]What mean'est thou by these? And Ziba said, [g]The asses be for the king's household to ride on; and the bread and summer-fruit [h]for the young men to eat; and the wine, [i]that such as be faint in the wilderness may drink.

3 And the king said, And [j]where is thy master's son? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold, he abideth at Jerusalem: for he said, [k]To-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father.

4 Then said the king to Ziba, [l]Behold, thine are all that pertained unto Mephibosheth. And Ziba said, I humble myself; let me find grace in thy sight, my lord, O king.

foolish: or, if it were followed, that some providence might defeat it. David prayed this, in a firm belief that God has all hearts and tongues in his hand; Job 12: 17. Isa. 8: 2, 3. and in hope that God would own and plead his just and injured cause. Note, We may pray in faith, and should pray with fervency, that God will turn that counsel into foolishness, which is taken against his people.

2. By policy. We must second our prayer with our endeavors, else we tempt God. It is good service to countermine the policy of the church's enemies. When David came to the top of the mount, he worshipped God, v. 32. Note, Weeping must not hinder worshipping, but quicken it rather. Now he penned the third Psalm, as appears by the title; and some think, his singing it was this worship. Just now Providence brought Hushai to him; while he was yet speaking, God heard, and sent him the person that should be instrumental to befool Ahithophel. He came to condole with David on his present trouble; but David, having great confidence in his conduct and faithfulness, resolved to employ him in the nature of a spy on Absalom: so he sent him back to Jerusalem, to wait for Absalom's arrival, as a deserter from David, and to offer him his service, v. 34. Thus he might insinuate himself into his counsels, and defeat Ahithophel, either by dissuading Absalom from following his advice, or by discovering it to David, that he might know where to stand on his guard. How this gross dissimulation, which David put Hushai upon, can be justified as a stratagem in war, I do not see. The best that can be made of it, is, that Absalom, if he rebel against his father, must stand on his guard against all mankind; and if he will be deceived, let him be deceived. David recommends him to Zadok and Abiathar, as persons proper to be consulted with, (v. 35.) and to their two sons, as trusty men to be sent on errands to David, v. 36. Hushai, thus instructed, came to Jerusalem, (v. 37.) whither also Absalom soon after came with his forces. How soon do royal palaces and royal cities change their masters! But we look for a kingdom which cannot be thus shaken, and in the possession of which we cannot be disturbed.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1—4. We read before how kind David was to Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan. This matter was well settled; ch. 9: 10. but, it seems, Ziba is not content to be manager, he longs to be master, of Mephibosheth's estate. Now he thinks is his time; if he can procure a grant of it from the crown, he hopes, whether David or Absalom get the better, it is all one to him, he shall succeed. In order hereunto,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 13—37. Our severest trials often come from those, in whom we most confided; and our firmest friends are sometimes raised up among persons, from whom we had the least expectations. But a truly pious man will never be entirely excluded from usefulness; some individuals, wherever he abides, will have to bless God for his example, converse, and prayers.—We often in despondency think our enemies to be more numerous, and our friends fewer, than they are found upon trial: for our severest crosses are mingled with comforts, which afford us causes for thankfulness.—The ministers of God should always set an example of submission to 'the powers that be,' in all things lawful; and of cordial attachment and faithful adherence to those rulers, who protect and countenance them in their pious labors; and especially in those seasons, when others oppose and revile them.—It behooves us to humble ourselves before God under the tokens of his displeasure; and godly sorrow, confession of sin, repentance, self-denial, and self-abasement are the proper methods of seeking deliverance out of those troubles, which are evidently chastisements for sins. (Is. 22: 8—14.) Vain is all worldly wisdom and power against 'the effectual, or [in-wrought,] fervent prayer of a righteous man;' as, in answer to a single emphatical ejaculation, 'the counsel of the prudent is carried headlong,' and the force of the potent is turned into perfect weakness.—Some are useful in one way, and some in another, to one common cause, when they are cordially united: yet alas! where shall we find wisdom and simplicity so united in any mere man, that we can perceive nothing which merits censure, and needs forgiveness? But when the Son of David was treated with all possible treachery, indignity, cruelty, and ingratitude; his wisdom, meekness, candor, and patience were unalloyed perfection. His inexpressible sufferings are now over: his humiliation is exchanged for the throne of glory, where unseen, except by realizing faith, He serves our cause in the world above. Let us follow, serve, and cleave to Him, in tribulation, life, and death. And let us not forget, that we are left behind among his enemies, to promote his cause; and his instruction is, that we be 'wise as serpents, and harmless as doves.' (Matt. 10: 16—18.) SCOTT.

may as well be out-witted as over-powered: but the instructions given to Hushai imply a falsehood, which cannot be wholly vindicated. Blessed art thou, O land, when thy princes use wine for strength, as David did, and not for drunkenness, as Absalom did, ch. 13: 28. See Eccl. 10: 17. 2. Having thus insinuated himself into David's affection, and gained credit with him, the next thing he does to compass his end, is, to incense him against Mephibosheth, by a false accusation, v. 3. David inquires for him as one of his family, which gives Ziba occasion. What immense damages do masters often sustain by lying servants! David knew Mephibosheth to be unambitious, easy in his place, and well affected to him and his government; yet he credits the calumny, and, without further inquiry or consideration, convicts Mephibosheth of treason, seizes his lands as forfeited, and grants them to Ziba; (v. 4.) a rash judgment, which afterward he was ashamed of, when the truth came to light, ch. 19: 29. Princes and great men ought to use all means possible to discover the truth, to guard against malicious, designing men, to be jealous of flatterers, and to remember that nature has given them two ears, that they may hear both sides.

V. 5—14. David bore Shimei's curses much better than Ziba's flatteries; by those he was brought to pass a wrong judgment on another, by these to pass a right judgment on himself; the world's smiles are more dangerous than its frowns Observe here,

I. How insolent and furious Shimei was. He took this opportunity to vent his malice, Because now he thought he might do it safely; now it would be most grievous to David, and pour vinegar into his wounds, (Ps. 69: 26.)—Because now he thought Providence justified his reproaches, and present afflictions proved David to be as bad as he was willing to represent him Job's friends condemned him on this false principle. If once it be said, God hath forsaken him, presently it follows Persecute and take him, Ps. 71: 11. But it is the character of a base spirit thus to trample on those that are down. No man could be more innocent of the blood of the house of Saul than David was. Once and again he spared Saul's life, while Saul sought his. When Saul and his sons were slain, David and his men were many miles off; and, when they heard it, lamented it. From the murder of Abner and Ish-bosheth he had sufficiently cleared himself; and yet all the blood of the house of Saul must be laid at his door; v. 7, 8. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. Selfish men often affect to appear generous, in giving away the property of others for their own advantage, and are great adepts in address and insinuation. Flatterers are generally backbiters; for it is as easy to them to forge slanders of the absent, as to pretend affection and respect for the present: and those servants, who purloin their master's substance, commonly likewise asperse their reputations.—When much treachery and ingratitude have been experienced, men are apt to become too suspicious; but while the dissimulation of false friends occasions sin, the rage, malice, and contumely of cruel enemies call forth the exercises of the believer's graces, and often prove advantageous to him.—It is good to see the hand of God directing, though not dictating, the injuries of men. Their calumnies may recall to memory some evil, or appearance of evil, which requires humiliation, watchfulness, and prayer: we deserve worse from the Lord than their most cruel and contemptuous treatment, and should consider it as his correction: and if we bear it humbly, patiently, and meekly, for his sake, He will graciously give us inward peace and consolation.—Seasons of peculiar humiliation before God, require peculiar long-suffering towards men: private revenge must never be indulged.—A deep sense of personal guilt will soften the spirit towards others, and dispose a man to be indignant and severe against himself: and the most zealous friends must be disregarded, and even reproved, when they counsel what is evidently wrong. Verses 5—14.

Bahurim was a city of Benjamin; and Shimei was a relation of Saul: so that the translation of the kingdom to David marred all his prospects of preferment. He disregarded the express appointment of God, and his heart was full of implacable enmity to David, as a usurper of the throne. The sin both of Shimei and of Absalom was from themselves and Satan: but David's affliction was from the Lord; and they were merely instruments, which He employed, without their intention, of correcting David for good. (Gen. 50:20. Is. 10:7, 15. Ez. 14:9—11. Acts 2:22—24.) The curse causeless could only injure him who used it: and David hoped that his humble submission to such base usage from man, would prepare the way for the return of peace and comfort from a merciful God; and therefore he would not permit Shimei to be molested. (M. R.—19:19—23. 1 K. 2:8, 9, 36—46.)

of evil to us. So partial are we to ourselves, that no rule can be more fallacious than this. Innocency is no fence against malice and falsehood; nor are we to think it strange, if we be charged with that which we have been most careful to keep ourselves from. It is well for us, that men are not to be our judges, but He, whose judgment is according to truth.

II. See how patient and submissive David was, under this abuse, v. 9. If David will but give them leave, his friends will put these lying, cursing lips to silence, and take off Shimei's head; for his throwing stones at the king was an overt act, which abundantly proved that he designed his death. But the king would by no means suffer it. Thus Christ rebuked the disciples, who, in zeal for his honor, would have fire from heaven on the town that affronted Him, Luke 9: 55. Let us see with what considerations David quieted himself.

1. The chief thing that silenced him, was, that he had deserved it: this is not mentioned indeed; for a man may truly repent, and yet needs not, on all occasions, proclaim his penitent reflections. Shimei unjustly upbraided him with the blood of Saul; from that his conscience acquitted him, but, at the same time, charged him with the blood of Uriah: 'The reproach is too true,' (thinks David,) 'though false as he means it.' Note, An humble, tender spirit will turn reproaches into reproofs, and so get good by them, instead of being provoked.

2. He observes the hand of God in it, v. 10, 11. As it was Shimei's sin, it was not from God, but from the devil, and his own wicked heart, nor did God's hand in it excuse or extenuate it, much less justify it, any more than it did their sin, who put Christ to death, Acts 2: 24. 4: 28. But, as it was David's affliction, it was from the Lord, one of the evils He raised up against him. David looked above the instrument to the Supreme Director, as Job, when the plunderers had stripped him, acknowledges, The Lord hath taken away. Nothing more proper to quiet a gracious soul under affliction, than an eye to the hand of God in it: I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it. The scourge of the tongue is God's rod.

3. He quiets himself under the less affliction, with the consideration of the greater, v. 11. Tribulation works patience in those that are sanctified.

4. He comforts himself with hopes that God would, some way or other, bring good to him out of his affliction, would balance the trouble itself, and recompense his patience under it: 'The Lord will requite me good for his cursing. If God bid Shimei grieve me, it is that He Himself may the more sensibly comfort me; surely He has mercy in store for me, which He is preparing me for by this trial.'

V. 15—23. Absalom had speedy notice by some of his friends at Jerusalem, that David was withdrawn, and with what a small retinue; so that the coasts were clear. Accordingly, he came without delay, (v. 15.) extremely elevated, no doubt; and now that he is master of Jerusalem, he concludes all his own, the country will follow of course. God suffers wicked men to prosper awhile in their wicked plots, even beyond their expectation, that their disappointment may be the more grievous and disgraceful.

The most celebrated politicians of that age, were, Ahithophel and Hushai; the former Absalom brings with him to Jerusalem, (v. 15.) the other meets him there; (v. 16.) so that he cannot but think himself sure of success; on them he relies, and consults not the ark, though he had that with them. But miserable counsellors were they both; for,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15—23. Men, who admire themselves, will be easily deceived by those who profess an attachment to them: yet they readily discern those faults in others, of which themselves are far more notoriously guilty; and are apt to express astonishment at them.—If a zealous disciple of Christ be betrayed into evident wickedness, even profligates will exclaim, 'Is this thy kindness to thy Friend!' But alas, how often might the Savior Himself address each of us in these words, to our shame and confusion! And how often should we thus check ourselves, and remember our ingratitude, to our deeper humiliation!—Destruction is before those, who hearken to deceitful and wicked counsellors: yet young people in general, especially in high life, will not regard any other.—How desperately wicked is the human heart, that can conceive, execute, and glory in those deeds of darkness, which it is shocking to think of, and shameful to mention! (Eph. 5: 8—14.) Yet all this might be drawn forth out of our hearts by successive temptations, if Satan and his agents were permitted to practise upon us!—When eminent abilities and daring wickedness unite in one character, they form the express image of the devil: and, like that arch-apostate and rebel, men of this description will spare no pains to push others forward into those kinds and degrees of guilt, which may drive them desperate, and extinguish all thoughts of reconciliation unto God! Verses 15—19.

Though Absalom interpreted Hushai's words as implying an express promise of fidelity, and an unreserved tender of his services, they did not necessarily imply these things. He said, 'Let the king live,' not Let king Absalom live. And when Absalom expressed his surprise, that he thus forsook his friend; he declared his resolution to accompany, and devote himself to him, whom the LORD and whom all Israel chose, but the event soon proved that this was not Absalom, however it appeared for a time. 'He would also serve in the presence of the son, as in the presence of the father.' But whom would he serve? He would serve David in Absalom's presence, as faithfully as he had hitherto done. (Gen. 3: 4, 5.)—If Absalom had not been blinded with pride and popularity, he would have suspected such ambiguous words, when used by the known and hitherto zealous friend of his father; and not have admitted him at once among his confidential counsellors.—It is indeed very difficult to conduct stratagems without such equivocations, if not direct falsehoods: and therefore it is best to keep at a distance from them if possible. SCOTT. CHAP. XVII.

Hushai's counsel is preferred to the politic, but desperately wicked counsel of Ahithophel, by the secret appointment of God, 1—14. Hushai sends intelligence to David, who hastily passes over Jordan, 15—22. Ahithophel returns home and hangs himself, 23. David comes to Mahanaim, 24. Amasa is made captain of Absalom's army, which is encamped at Gilead, 25, 26. David's friends bring him provisions, 27—29.

MOREOVER, Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Let me now choose out twelve thousand men, and [a] I will arise and pursue after David [b] this night:

2 And I will come upon him while he is [c] weary and weak-handed, and will make him afraid: and all the people that are with him shall flee, and [d] I will smite the king only.

be faithful to; and he is for the king in succession, (v. 19.) the rising sun. True, he loved his father; but he had had his day, and it was over; and why should he not love his successor as well?

II. Ahithophel counselled him to do wickedly, and so as effectually betrayed him. It seems, Ahithophel was noted as a deep politician, v. 23. Such reputation was he in for subtilty and sagacity in public affairs, that all people, good and bad, both David and Absalom, had a profound regard to his sentiments. Let us observe, from this account of Ahithophel's fame for policy, 1. Many excel in worldly wisdom, who are utterly destitute of heavenly grace, because those who set up oracles for themselves, are apt to despise the oracles of God. God has chosen the foolish things of the world, and the greatest statesmen are seldom the greatest saints. 2. Great politicians frequently act most foolishly for themselves. Ahithophel is cried up for an oracle, and yet very unwisely takes part with Absalom, who was not only a usurper, but a rash youth, never likely to come to good; whose fall, and the fall of all that adhered to him, any one, with the tenth part of the policy Ahithophel pretended to, might foresee. Well, after all, honesty is the best policy, and will be found so in the long run.

Observe, (1.) The wicked counsel Ahithophel gave, v. 21. The divine law had made what he advises a capital crime, Lev. 20: 11. And the apostle speaks of it as a piece of villany, not so much as named among the Gentiles, 1 Cor. 5: 1. Reuben lost his birth-right for it. But Ahithophel advised to it as a political thing, because it would give assurance to all Israel, that he was in good earnest in his pretensions; and resolved never to make peace with his father on any terms, of which, perhaps, the people were jealous, and that they must be sacrificed to the reconciliation. Having drawn the sword, he thus threw away the scabbard, which would strengthen the hands of his party, and keep them tight to him. This cursed policy bespoke him rather an oracle of the devil, than of God.

(2.) Absalom's compliance, v. 22. When an unnatural rebellion was the opera, what fitter prologue than such unnatural lust? Thus was his wickedness all of a piece, and such as a conscience, not quite seared, could not entertain the thoughts of without the utmost horror. Nay, the client outdoes what his counsel advises: Ahithophel bid him do it, that all Israel might hear of it; but so perfectly lost is he to all honor and virtue, he will do it, and all Israel shall see it. Yet, in this, the word of God was fulfilled in the letter of it; (ch. 12: 11, 12.) and some think Ahithophel, in advising it, designed to be revenged on David for the injury to Bath-sheba, who was his grand-daughter: for she was the daughter of Eliam, (ch. 11: 3.) who was the son of Ahithophel, ch. 23: 34. Job speaks of a circumstance like this, as the just punishment of adultery, (ch. 31: 9, 10.) and the prophet, Hos. 4: 13, 14. What to think of these concubines, who submitted to this wickedness, it were easy to say; but how unrighteous soever Absalom and they are, we must say, The Lord is righteous: nor shall any word of his fall to the ground.

CHAP. XVII. The contest between David and Absalom is now drawing to a crisis. It must be determined by the sword, and preparation is made, accordingly in this ch. Hitherto, every thing has looked black upon poor David, but now the day of his deliverance begins to dawn.

V. 1—14. David reigned in Hebron, over the tribe of Judah only, above seven years, and was not hasty to destroy his rival: but the young man, Absalom, not only hastens from Hebron to Jerusalem, but is impatient there, till he has destroyed his father. That so profligate a wretch should aim at the throne of so good a father, is not so strange; but that the body of the people of Israel, to whom David had been so great a blessing in all respects, should join with him in it, is very amazing. But their fathers often mutinied against Moses. The best of parents, and the best of princes, will not think it strange, if they be made uneasy by those who should be their support and joy, when they consider what sons and what subjects David himself had.

David, and all that adhered to him, must be cut off. That is resolved, for aught that appears, unanimously. It was not long since Absalom himself fled for a crime, and David contented himself with his being an exile, though he deserved death, nay, David mourned and longed for him; but so perfectly void of all natural affection is this ungrateful Absalom, that he absolutely thirsts for his own father's blood.

I. Ahithophel's advice, v. 1—3. By this, it appears Absalom had declared his design to be on David's life, and Ahithophel concurs with him in it; Smite the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered, an easy prey to the wolf. Nothing could have been more fatal to David, than the taking of these measures. See how usurpers call a general ruin, a general peace (v. 3.); but thus the devil's palace is in peace, while he, as a strong man armed, keeps it. Compare here the plot of Caiaphas (that second Ahithophel) against Christ; Let that one man die for the people, John 11: 50. This saying, I will smite the king only, pleased Absalom well! (v. 4.) nor had he so much sense of honor and virtue left him, as to pretend to startle at it, or even to be reluctant in this barbarous and monstrous resolution. What good can stand before the heat of a furious ambition?

II. Hushai's advice, v. 8—13. in giving which, he really intended to serve David and his interest; that he might have time to send him notice of his proceedings, and David gain time to gather an army, and remove into those countries beyond Jordan, which, lying more remote, Absalom, probably, had got least interest in. Nothing would be of greater advantage to David in this juncture, than time to turn himself in; that he may have that, Hushai counsels Absalom to do nothing rashly, but to proceed with caution, and secure his success by securing his strength. All the elders of Israel approved of Ahithophel's counsel, yet God overruled the heart of Absalom not to proceed upon it, till he had advised with Hushai, v. 5. Herein he thought he did wisely, but God taketh the wise in their own craftiness. Hushai argued against Ahithophel's counsel, and undertook to show the danger of following his advice. With modesty, and all possible deference, he begs leave to differ from him, v. 7. The counsel of Ahithophel is usually the best, but not at this time; it was not safe to venture so great a cause on so small a number, and such a hasty sally; it has often proved of bad consequence to despise an enemy. See how plausibly Hushai reasons: David was a man of great conduct, courage, and experience; (v. 8, 10.) and not so weary and weak-handed as Ahithophel imagines. His retiring from Jerusalem must be imputed, not to his cowardice, but to his prudence. His attendants, though few, were mighty men, (v. 8, 10.) of celebrated bravery, versed in all the arts of war. They were all exasperated against Absalom, the author of all this mischief, and would fight with the utmost fury; so that there would be no standing before them, especially for such raw soldiers as Absalom's generally were. Thus does he represent them as formidable as Ahithophel had made them despicable. He suggests that, probably, David and some of his men would lie in ambush, and fall on Absalom's soldiers before they were aware, the terror of which would put them to flight, v. 9. 'It will soon be given out, that there is a slaughter among Absalom's men, and then they will all make the best of their way, and the heart of Ahithophel himself, though now it seems like the heart of a lion, will

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 7—14. Ahithophel's former counsel was followed, for God intended to correct David: (16:20—23.) but his latter was not, for he did not mean to destroy him, but Absalom. Thus God answered David's prayer, and turned the good, i. e. the politic counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness. (15:31. 16:15—19.)—A bear, &c. (8) Hos. 13:5—8. SCOTT.

Appointed. (14) Commanded. (M.) It was God's determined purpose thus to defeat Ahithophel's counsel, and to preserve David; and the whole transaction was so conducted, by his secret influence on bed of her whelps in the field: and [l] thy father is a man of war, and will not lodge with the people.

9 Behold, [m] he is hid now in some pit, or in some other place: and it will come to pass, when [n] some of them be [*] overthrown at the first, that whosoever heareth it, will say, There is a slaughter among the people that follow Absalom.

10 And he also that is valiant, whose [o] heart is as the heart of a lion, shall [p] utterly melt: for all Israel knoweth that thy father is a mighty man, and they which be with him are valiant men.

11 Therefore I counsel, that [q] all Israel be generally gathered unto thee, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, [r] as the sand that is by the sea for multitude, and that [†] thou go to battle [s] in thine own person.

12 So shall we come upon him [t] in some place where he shall be found, and [u] we will light upon him as the dew falleth on the ground: and of him, and of all the men that are with him, there shall not be left so much as one.

13 Moreover, if he be gotten into a city, then shall all Israel bring ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river, until there be not [x] one small stone found there.

14 And Absalom and all the men of Israel said, The counsel of Hushai the Archite is better than the counsel of Ahithophel: for [y] the LORD had [‡] appointed [z] to defeat the [a] good counsel of Ahithophel, to the intent that the LORD might bring evil upon Absalom.

15 ¶ Then said Hushai unto [b] Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, Thus and thus did Ahithophel counsel Absalom and the elders of Israel; and thus and thus have I counselled.

16 Now therefore send quickly, and tell David, saying, [c] Lodge not this night in the plains of the wilderness, [d] but speedily pass over; lest the king [e] be swallowed up, and all the people that are with him.

17 Now [f] Jonathan and Ahimaaz stayed by [g] En-rogel, (for they might not be seen to come into the city,) and a wench went and told them: and they went and told king David.

18 Nevertheless a lad saw them, and told Absalom: but they went both of them away quickly, and came to a man's house in [h] Bahurim, which had a well in his court, whither they went down.

19 And the woman took and [i] spread a covering over the well's mouth, and spread ground corn thereon; and the thing was not known.

20 And when Absalom's servants came to the woman to the house, they said, Where is Ahimaaz and Jonathan? And the woman said unto them, [j] They be gone over the brook of water. And [k] when they had sought, and could not find them, they returned to Jerusalem.

21 And it came to pass after they were departed, that they came up out of the well, and went and told king David, and said unto David, [l] Arise, and pass quickly over the water; for [m] thus hath Ahithophel counselled against you.

And what tricks are often in courts, and councils, which they are happiest that are least conversant with. See how much more the providence of God can do: Hushai managed the plot with dexterity, yet the success is ascribed to God, and his agency on the minds of those concerned; The Lord had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel. Be it observed, to the comfort of all that fear God, He turns all men's hearts as the rivers of waters, though they know not the thoughts of the Lord. He stands in the congregation of the mighty, has an overruling hand in all counsels, and a negative voice in all resolves, and laughs at men's projects against his anointed.

V. 15—21. We must now leave David's enemies pleasing themselves with thoughts of a sure victory, by following Hushai's counsel, and we next find David's friends consulting how to get him notice of all this, that he might steer his course accordingly. Hushai tells the priests what had passed in council, v. 15. But, it should seem, he was not sure Ahithophel's counsel might not be followed, and was therefore jealous, lest, if he made not the best of his way, the king would be swallowed up, and all the people that were with him, v. 16. Perhaps, as he was called in to give his advice, (v. 5.) so he was dismissed before they came to that resolve, (v. 14.) in favor of his advice. Or he feared they might afterward change their mind. However, it was good to provide against the worst, and therefore to hasten those valuable lives out of the reach of these destroyers.

Such strict guards did Absalom set upon all the avenues to Jerusalem, that they had much ado to get this necessary intelligence to David, v. 17. but Providence can serve its wise counsels by the foolish things of the world. The woman, v. 19. thus far, did well; but we know not how to justify her concealing the messengers with a lie, v. 20. We must not do evil that good may come of it. However, hereby they were protected, and the pursuers defeated, and returned to Absalom without their prey. It was well Absalom did not, hereupon, fall upon their two fathers, Zadok and Abiathar, as Saul on Ahimelech for his kindness to David; but God restrained him. Being thus preserved, they brought their intelligence very

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When Satan has seduced men into a wicked course of life, every crime makes more and greater enormities almost necessary; and they must go forward, or lose the fruit, and suffer the punishment, of their former villanies.—His decided servants are more sagacious and vigorous in their mischievous devices, than the Lord's servants are in doing good: and they have a very great apparent advantage; being freed from the restraints of conscience, gratitude, natural affection, and the fear of God; [while, on the other hand, good men are apt to trust too much to 'a good cause,' and neglect active duty.]—That some few individuals should be monsters of iniquity would not excite much surprise: but from age to age immense multitudes are found, who with one consent break through every tie of duty; especially when engaged in opposing the cause of religion and its cordial friends: and this demonstrates, that man by [his present degenerated] nature is an enemy to the service and holiness of God.—The Lord can perform the greatest deliverances by the feeblest instruments: and whatever wisdom, address, despatch, or assistance, any man employs or affords; the success is from God alone, who will not suffer one of his people to perish.—When Satan has tempted men to successive crimes, till they are ripe for destruction; and when Providence has disappointed their ambitious and vain-glorious projects, and their lives are rendered miserable; the last device of that subtle enemy is to urge them to murder themselves: and in this way he sometimes deludes those, who have been most renowned for wisdom, but who are at length so foolish as to plunge themselves into everlasting misery, for fear of temporal disgrace and suffering!—Our King indeed needs not our help: but He has assured us, that what we do for the least of his brethren, who are sick, poor, or destitute, shall be accepted and recompensed, as if it were done to Himself in person. It is also remarkable that he should have hanged himself, rather than kill himself in any other way. (Deut. 21:22, 23. Matt. 27:3—5.) David's prayer was answered more terribly than he expected or desired. (M. R.)

Nahash was evidently another name of Jesse. [Tremellius, however, supposes it the name of the wife of Jesse.] Ithra is supposed to have been an Ishmaelite by birth, but proselyted to the religion of Israel.—Amasa was nephew to David, by Abigail his sister, as were also Joab and Abishai, by Zeruiah. (28.) '"The Moors of W. Barbary use the flour of parched barley as provision for their journeys, and often at home; they carry it in a leathern satchel." Jones. This is ordinarily of goat-skin; one now lies before me, drawn off the animal before it was cut up; the places where the forelegs, tail, &c. were, are elegantly closed, and have leathern thongs, by which it can be slung over the back of man, ass, or camel. The skin is tanned; and the upper side curiously embroidered, with red, black, blue, yellow, and flesh-colored leather, in very curious and elegant forms and devices. Bags of this kind [comp. an Egyptian leathern bag, cut, Lev. 11:32, 35.] are used for carrying wine, water, milk, butter, grain, flour, clothes, and merchandise. This is the scripture bottle. Jones further says, "Travellers use zumeet, flour mixed with honey, butter, and spice; tumeet, flour done up with organ oil; and limereece, flour mixed with water for drink. This quenches thirst much better than water alone; satisfies hunger; cools and refreshes weary spirits; overcoming the ill effects of a hot sun and fatiguing journey." This flour might be made of grain or pulse of any kind: and probably may be what we here term parched corn and parched pulse; and, in the forms above, was a well-timed supply for David's people, hungry, weary, and thirsty in the wilderness.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

CHAP. XVIII.

David musters his troops under three commanders, and charges them to spare Absalom, 1—5. He laments most bitterly, 33.

AND David [a] numbered the people that were with him, and set [b] captains of thousands and captains of hundreds over them.

2 And David sent forth [c] a third part of the people under [d] the hand of Joab, and a third part under the hand of Abishai the son of Zeruiah, Joab's brother, and a third part under the hand of [e] Ittai the Gittite. And the king said unto the people, [f] I will surely go forth with you myself also.

3 But the people answered, [g] Thou shalt not go forth: for, [h] if we flee away they will not *care for us; neither if half of us die will they care for us: but now thou art † worth ten thousand of us; therefore now it is better that thou ‡succor us out of the city.

4 And the king said unto them, What seemeth you best I will do. And the king stood [i] by the gate-side, and all the people came out [j] by hundreds and by thousands.

5 And the king commanded Joab, and Abishai, and Ittai, saying, [k] Deal gently for my sake with the young man, even with Absalom. And [l] all the people heard when the king gave all the captains charge concerning Absalom.

6 So the people went out into the field against Israel: and the battle was in the [m] wood of Ephraim;

Selah; it is a thing to be marked and meditated upon, Ps. 7: 15, 16. (3.) Prayer answered, and an honest cause served even by its enemies. Now, as David had prayed, Ahithophel's counsel was turned into foolishness to himself. Lightfoot supposes David penned the 55th Psalm, on occasion of Ahithophel's being in the plot against him, and that he is the man complained of, (v. 13.) that had been his equal, his guide, and his acquaintance; and if so, this was an immediate answer to his prayer there, (v. 15.) Let death seize on them, let them go down quick into hell. Ahithophel's death was an advantage to David's interest; for had he digested that affront, and continued his post at Absalom's elbow, he might have given him counsel afterward, that might have been of pernicious consequence to David. It seems, it was not then usual to disgrace the dead bodies of self-murderers, for Ahithophel was buried, we may suppose, honorably buried, in the sepulchre of his father, though he deserved no better than the burial of an ass: see Eccl. 8: 10.

III. Absalom's pursuit of his father; he had now got all the men of Israel with him, as Hushai advised, and he himself, at the head of them, passed over Jordan, v. 24. He pitched in the land of Gilead with all his forces, ready to give David battle, v. 26. Amasa's father (v. 25.) was, by birth, Jether, an Ishmaelite, (1 Chron. 2: 17.) but, by religion, Ithra, (as here,) an Israelite; probably, he was not only proselyted, but, having married a near relation of David's, was, by some act of the state, naturalized, and is therefore called an Israelite. His wife, Amasa's mother, was Abigail, David's sister, whose other sister, Zeruiah, was Joab's mother, 1 Chr. 2: 16. So that Amasa was the same relation to David that Joab was. Jesse is here called Nahash, for many had two names; or perhaps it was his wife's name.

IV. The friends David met with in this distant country. Even Shobi, a younger brother of the royal family of the Ammonites, was kind to him, v. 27. Probably he had detested the indignity his brother Hanun did David's ambassadors, and, for that, had received favors from David, which he now returns. Machir was he that maintained Mephibosheth, (ch. 9: 4.) till David eased him of that charge; and is now repaid for it by that generous man, who, it seems, was the common patron of distressed princes. Barzillai we shall hear of again. These, compassionating David and his men, brought in plenty of all he had occasion for. Let us learn hence to be generous and open-handed, according as our ability is, to all in distress, especially [to] great men, to whom it is most grievous, and good men, who deserve better treatment. Observe here, how God sometimes makes up to his people that comfort from strangers, which they are disappointed of in their own families.

CHAP. XVIII. This ch. puts a period to Absalom's rebellion and life, and so makes way for David to his throne, whither the next ch. brings him back in peace and triumph.

V. 1—8. Now here we have,

I. David's army numbered and marshalled, v. 1, 2. He had, no doubt, committed his cause to God by prayer, for that was his relief in all his afflictions; and then he took an account of his forces; Josephus says, in all, but about 4000: these he divided into regiments, and companies, with proper officers, and then disposed them, as is usual, into the right wing, left wing, and centre, two of which he committed to his two old, experienced generals, Joab and Abishai, and the third to his new friend Ittai. Good order and good conduct may sometimes be as serviceable in an army, as great numbers. Wisdom teaches us to make the best of the strength we have.

II. David's true friends would not let him go to battle, remembering Ahithophel's design to smite the king only. David showed his affection to them by being willing to venture with them; (v. 2.) and they theirs to him by opposing it. We must never reckon it an affront to be gainsayed for our good, and by those that therein consult our interest. 1. Good princes ought to be valued by their subjects, who, for their safety, must be willing to expose themselves. 2. They would not so far gratify the enemy, who would rejoice more in his fall, than in the defeat of the whole army. 3. He might be more serviceable to them by tarrying in the city, with a reserve of his forces there, whence he might send them recruits. So he acquiesced, (v. 4.) It is no part of wisdom to be stiff in our resolutions, but to be willing to hear reason, even from inferiors, and to be overruled by their advice, when it appears to be for our own good. Whether the people's prudence had an eye to it or no, God's providence wisely ordered it, that David should not be in the field of battle: for then his tenderness had certainly interposed to save Absalom's life, whom God had determined to destroy.

III. The charge he gave concerning Absalom, v. 5. How does he render good for evil! Absalom would have David only smitten, David would have Absalom only spared. What foils are these to each other! Never was unnatural hatred to a father more strong than in Absalom; never natural affection to a child more strong than in David; as if designed to be a resemblance of man's wickedness toward God, and God's mercy toward man. This charge supposes David's strong expectation of success; he doubts not but Absalom would lie at their mercy, and therefore bids them deal gently with him, spare his life, and reserve him for his judgment. 'Was it not in type of that unmeasurable mercy of the true King and Redeemer of Israel, who prayed for his persecutors, for his murderers; Father, forgive them. Deal gently with them for my sake.' So Bp. Hall. When God sends an affliction to correct his children, it is with this charge, 'Deal gently with them for my sake;' for He knows our frame.

IV. A complete victory gained over Absalom's forces. The wood of Ephraim, (v. 6.) was so called from some memorable action of the Ephraimites there, though it lay in the tribe of Gad. David thought fit to meet the enemy there, before they came up to Mahanaim, lest he should bring that city into trouble, which had so kindly sheltered him. Josephus represents the fight as very obstinate, but the rebels were at length totally routed, v. 7. Now they see what it is to take counsel against the Lord, and his anointed, and to think of breaking his bands asunder. And that they might see that God fought against them, they are conquered by a few, an army probably much inferior to theirs in number. By that flight with which they hoped to save themselves, they destroy themselves also; the wood, which they sought to for shelter, devoured more than the CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—3. It is probable, David's army was greatly inferior in numbers to Absalom's, but far superior in discipline; and consisted chiefly of old and approved friends, and such as acted from principle and conscience in adhering to their prince. This appears in the answer they returned to his proposal of leading them to battle in his own person. SCOTT.

NOTES.

9 And Absalom met the servants of David: and Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and [r] his head caught hold of the oak, and he was [s] taken up between the heaven and the earth; and the mule that was under him went away.

10 And a certain man saw it, and told Joab, and said, Behold, I saw Absalom hanged in an oak.

11 And Joab said unto the man that told him, And, behold, thou sawest him; and why didst thou not smite him there to the ground, and I would have given thee ten shekels of silver, and a girdle?

12 And the man said unto Joab, Though I should * receive a thousand shekels of silver in mine hand, yet would I not put forth mine hand against the king's son: for [t] in our hearing the king charged thee, and Abishai, and Ittai, saying, † Beware that none touch the young man Absalom.

13 Otherwise I should have [u] wrought falsehood against mine own life: [v] for there is no matter hid from the king, and thou thyself wouldest have set thyself against me.

14 Then said Joab, I may not tarry thus ‡ with thee. And he took three darts in his hand, and [w] thrust them through the heart of Absalom, while he was yet alive in the § midst of the oak.

The ancient Irish kings of Ulster (the O'Niels) carried a hand on their signet ring and arms: hence the bloody hand is the badge of baronets in England; and Louis IX of France is represented with a hand surmounting his sceptre. Niebuhr says, the mosque of Ali has his hand on the dome, and Mortier gives the cut of the hand of Mohammed, which formed part of the pageantry of a religious procession in Persia. If such a standard were very ancient, (cuts, Ps. 20: 5.) it would suggest to Saul or Absalom at once a durable and beautiful model of an obelisk, cut, Judg. 9:6. Did Absalom erect such an obelisk on a base hewn on the rock, and now concealed by the modern casing? A cut of 'Absalom's pillar,' as it is now, is given. 'The lower portion is quadrangular, standing entirely detached from the living rock, from which it was hewn. [Practical Observations.]

19 ¶ Then said [e] Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, Let me now run and bear the king tidings, how that the LORD hath * avenged him of his enemies.

20 And Joab said unto him, Thou shalt not † bear tidings this day, but thou shalt bear tidings another day; but this day thou shalt bear no tidings, [f] because the king's son is dead.

21 Then said Joab to Cushi, Go tell the king what thou hast seen. And Cushi bowed himself unto Joab, and ran.

22 Then said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok yet again to Joab, But ‡ howsoever, let me, I pray thee, also run after Cushi. And Joab said, Wherefore wilt thou run, my son, seeing that thou hast no tidings § ready?

23 But howsoever, said he, let me run. And he said unto him, Run. Then Ahimaaz ran by the way of the plain, and over-ran Cushi.

24 And David sat [g] between the two gates: and [h] the watchman went up to the roof over the gate unto the wall, and lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold a man running alone.

25 And the watchman cried, and told the king. And the king said, If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth. And he came apace, and drew near.

26 And the watchman saw another man running, and the watchman called unto the porter, and said, Behold, another man running alone. And the king said, He also bringeth tidings.

27 And the watchman said, ‖ Methinketh the running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz the son of Zadok. And the king said, [i] He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings.

28 And Ahimaaz called, and said unto the king, ¶ All is well. And [k] he fell down to the earth upon his face before the king, and said, [l] Blessed be the LORD thy God, which hath  delivered up the men, that lifted up their hand against my lord the king.

so proud of, and for which he had been so much admired? Where his aspiring projects, and castles in the air? His thoughts perish, and he with them. And, to signify how heavy his iniquity lay upon his bones, as the prophet speaks, (Ezek. 32: 27.) they raised a great heap of stones upon him, to be a monument of his villany, and to signify that he ought to have been stoned as a rebellious son, Deut. 21: 21. Travellers say, the place is noticed to this day, and that passengers throw a stone to this heap, with a Curse to the memory of rebellious Absalom, and to all wicked children that rise up in rebellion against their parents. To aggravate the ignominy of his burial, the historian notices a pillar he had erected in the valley of Kidron, near Jerusalem, to be a monument for himself, and keep his name in remembrance, (v. 18.) at the foot of which, probably, he designed to be buried. What foolish, insignificant projects do proud men fill their heads with! And what care do many people take about the disposal of their bodies, when dead, that have no care at all what shall become of their precious souls! Absalom had had three sons, (ch. 14: 27.) but had none now, it seems, and justly is a rebellious son written childless; to make up the want, he erects this pillar for a memorial; yet, in this also, Providence crosses him, and a rude heap of stones shall be his monument instead of this marble pillar. His care was, to have his name kept in remembrance, and it is so, to his everlasting dishonor.

V. 19—33. Absalom's business is done; we are now told, I. How David was informed of it.

1. Joab ordered Cushi to carry the tidings, (v. 21.) an Ethiopian, so his name signifies, and some think he was so by birth; a black, probably one of the ten that had helped despatch Absalom, (v. 15.) as some think, though it was dangerous for one of those to bring the news to David, lest his fate should be the same with theirs that reported to him Saul's death, and Ishbosheth's.

2. Ahimaaz, the young priest, ch. 17: 17. was very forward to bear the tidings, so transported was he with joy that this cloud was blown over, v. 19. This he desired, not so much in hope of a reward, (he was above that,) as to have the pleasure and satisfaction of bringing the king, whom he loved, this good news. Joab knew David better than Ahimaaz did, and that the tidings of Absalom's death, which must conclude the story, would spoil the acceptableness of all the rest; and he loves Ahimaaz too well to let him bear those tidings, (v. 20.) they are fitter to be brought by a footman than a priest. However, when Cushi was gone, Ahimaaz begged hard for leave to run after him, and with great importunity obtained it, v. 22, 23. One would wonder why he should be so very fond of this office, when another was employed in it. Perhaps to show his swiftness; observing how heavily Cushi ran, and that he took the worst way, though the nearest. No great praise for a priest to be swift of foot, yet perhaps Ahimaaz was proud of it. Perhaps he desired it in prudence and tenderness to the king. If bad news must come, let it come gradually, and it will be the better borne.

3. They are both discovered by the watchman on the gate of Mahanaim; Ahimaaz first, (v. 24.) but, presently, Cushi, v. 26. Ahimaaz, it seems, was so famous for running, that he was known by it at a distance; and so eminently good, it was taken for granted, if he be the messenger, the news must needs be good: he would not bring bad news. It is pity but the good tidings of the Gospel should

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. The peculiar exercises of religion ought to precede, but not to exclude, the use of every prudent mean of securing success in lawful undertakings: and those who would engage others in arduous and perilous attempts, must be willing to take a full share of the hardship and danger. Thus Jesus loved his people, and laid down his life for them: and thus they consider his cause as dearer to them than every personal interest, and are prepared to lay down their lives for his sake.—True courage and firmness of mind are very different from rashness and obstinacy; and wise men are always most ready to listen to prudent counsel, even from their inferiors.—The extremes of our most amiable propensities are often of fatal consequence: and it is merciful for God to deny us those things which we greatly desire, when He sees they would prove our temptation or affliction.—Multitudes suffer through the wickedness of one, but for their own crimes: and rebellion against good and lawful governors is generally and justly punished with the ruin of those concerned in it.—At all times 'evil pursueth sinners:' and when in the appointed hour it overtakes them, they cannot possibly escape; but those things on which they have most depended, and of which they have been most proud, often prove the occasion or instruments of their destruction.—Let young people look on Absalom, suspended on the tree, accursed and forsaken of Heaven and earth; and there read the Lord's abhorrence of rebellion against parents: let them consider the agony of his death, and the ignominy of his burial, and learn how empty are all external embellishments; and how vain the flattery of man, (14: 25—27.) and all that care, which is employed in rendering themselves [simply] admired and renowned. After all, 'the memory of the wicked shall rot:' and nothing can preserve us from misery and contempt, but heavenly grace and wisdom. SCOTT.

massive sepulchral architecture the Israelites derived from Egypt, might very well have been the tombs of those to whom they are assigned [Absalom, Jehoshaphat, and Zacharias, &c.] while the Ionic pilasters and other ornaments of a subsequent period might not improbably have been the very garnishing of the sepulchres alluded to by our Savior, (Luke 23:29.) added either in his days or a short time before, when the reduction of Judea into a Roman province, and the example of Herod, had introduced a different style.' Three weeks in Palestine and Lebanon, 1835. Verses 19—22.

Ahimaaz had continued with David, after he had brought tidings from Hushai; (17:17—21.) and was present in the battle, probably sounding the sacred trumpet. (Num. 10:1—10. 2 Chr. 13:4—12.) SCOTT.

Verse 24.

The gate seems to have opened into a square building, or square enclosed with porticoes, with accommodations for sitting, where justice was administered: an opposite gate opening into the city: and the building having a second story for the guards stationed on its roof. ED.

Verses 28—32.

The piety of the language both of Ahimaaz and Cushi, on this occasion, are worthy of notice and imitation. SCOTT.

30 And the king said unto him, Turn aside, and stand here. And he turned aside, and stood still.

31 And, behold, Cushi came: and Cushi said, * Tidings, my lord the king: for [n] the LORD hath avenged thee this day of all them that rose up against thee.

32 And the king said unto Cushi, Is the young man Absalom safe? and Cushi answered, [o] The enemies of my lord the king, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is.

33 And the king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept: and as he went, thus he said, [p] O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! [q] Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!

CHAP. XIX.

The people being greatly disappointed and discouraged by David's conduct, Joab, by rude expostulations, induces him to restrain his grief and come forth to them, 1—8. The men of Israel dispute about bringing back David; who sends to the priests to incite the men of Judah to take the lead in this; and they readily comply, 9—15. Shimei submitting is not punished, 16—23. Mephibosheth meets David; complains that Ziba had deceived and slandered him; and has half his land restored, 24—30. Barzillai attends David over Jordan, and his son is taken into the king's family, 31—40. The Israelites expostulate with the men of Judah, for bringing back the king without them, 41—43.

always be brought by good men; and how welcome should they be to us for their message-sake!

4. Ahimaaz is very forward to proclaim the victory; (v. 28.) cries at a distance, and when he comes near, tells the news more particularly. He fell on his face, not only in reverence to the king, but in humble adoration of God, whose name he praises for this success. By directing David thus to give God thanks for his victory, he prepares him for the approaching news of its allay. The more our hearts are fixed, and enlarged, in thanksgiving to God for our mercies, the better disposed we shall be to bear with patience the afflictions mixed with them. Poor David is so much a father, that he forgets he is a king, and therefore cannot rejoice in the news of a victory, till he know whether Absalom be safe; for whom his heart seems to tremble, almost as Eli's, in a like case, for the ark of God. Ahimaaz soon discerns what Joab intimated, that the death of the king's son would make the tidings of the day very unwelcome, therefore in his report leaves that matter doubtful; though he gives occasion to suspect how it was, yet, that the thunder-clap might not come too suddenly, he refers the king to the next messenger, whom they saw coming, for a more particular account. He is therefore bid to stand by till Cushi came; (v. 30.) and now, we may suppose, he gives the king a more particular account of the victory, which was the thing he came to bring the news of.

5. Cushi, besides confirming the news of the victory, v. 31. satisfies the king's inquiry concerning Absalom, v. 32. but he tells the news so properly, that, how unwelcome soever the message, the messenger could have no blame. He does not say plainly Absalom was hanged, run through, and buried under a heap of stones; but only that his fate was what he desired might be the fate of all traitors against the king.

II. We are told how David received the intelligence, v. 33. As soon as he perceived by Cushi's expression that Absalom was dead, he asked no more questions, but fell into a passion of weeping, retired from company, and abandoned himself to sorrow; as he was going up to his chamber, he was overheard to say, 'O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom; alas, for thee! I lament thee: how art thou fallen! Would God I had died for thee, and that thou hadst remained alive this day,' so the Chaldee adds, 'O Absalom, my son, my son.' I wish I could see reason to think, that this arose from a concern about Absalom's everlasting state, and that he wished to have died for him, because he had good hopes of his own salvation, and of Absalom's repentance, if he had lived: it seems rather to have been spoken inconsiderately, and in a passion, and it was his infirmity. He is to be blamed, 1. For showing so great a fondness for a graceless, however handsome and witty, son, that was justly abandoned both of God and man. 2. For quarrelling, not only with divine providence, the disposals of which he ought silently to acquiesce in, but divine justice, the judgments of which he ought to adore and subscribe to: see how Bildad argues, Job 8: 3, 4. See also Lev. 10: 3. 3. For opposing the justice of the nation, which, as king, he, with other public interests, ought to prefer before any natural affection. 4 For despising the mercy of his deliverance, and the deliverance of his family and kingdom, from Absalom's wicked designs, as if this were no mercy, nor worth giving thanks for, because it cost the life of Absalom. 5. For indulging a strong passion, and speaking unadvisedly with his lips. He now forgot his own reasonings on the death of another child, Can I bring him back again? and his own resolution to keep his mouth as with a bridle, when his heart was hot within him; as well as his own practice at other times, when he quieted himself, as a child that was weaned from his mother. The best men are not always in a good frame; what we over-loved, we are apt to over-grieve for: in each affection, therefore, it is wisdom to have rule over our own spirits; and to keep a strict guard on ourselves, when that is removed from us, which was very dear to us. The penitent, patient sufferer sitteth alone, and keepeth silence; (Lam. 3: 28.) or rather, with Job, says, Blessed be the name of the Lord.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1—8. Soon after the messengers had brought the news of the defeat and death of Absalom to the court at Mahanaim, Joab and his victorious army followed, to grace the king's triumphs, and receive his further orders. But,

I. What a damp was it to find the king in tears for Absalom's death, which they construed as a token of his displeasure against them for what they had done, whereas they had expected him to meet them with joy and thanks for their good services. It was told Joab, v. 1. The report of it ran through the army, v. 2. The people will notice particularly what their princes say and do: the more eyes we have upon us, and the greater our influence, the more need we have to speak and act wisely, and govern our passions strictly.

When they came to the city, they found the king in close mourning, v. 4. He covered his face, and would not so much as look up, nor take any notice of the generals, when they attended him. It could not but surprise them; yet see how he avows his grief, He cries with a loud voice, O my son Absalom. 'My servants are all come home safe, but my son, alas! is dead; and, dying in sin, I fear, he is lost for ever: I cannot now say, I shall go to him; my soul shall not be gathered with such sinners; what shall be done for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!' Had he contented himself with giving vent to his passion for an hour or two, when he first heard the news, it had been excusable; but to continue it thus for so bad a son, like Jacob for good Joseph, with a resolution to go to the grave mourning, and to stain his triumphs with his tears, was very unwise and very unworthy.

Now, see how ill this was taken by the people. They were loath to blame the king, for whatever he did used to please them, (ch. 3: 36.) but they took it as a great mortification. Their victory was turned into mourning, v. 2. They stole into the city as men ashamed, v. 3. In compliment to their sov-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19—33. Every deliverance should be received with praise and thanksgiving: and good men delight in bearing glad tidings to those whom they love. May all, who proclaim the glad tidings, be men of holy lives, and unblemished reputation; and may numbers more be sent forth with this joyful message!—All other good tidings but those of salvation to sinners, have so much alloy, that our joy on account of them must be mingled with weeping, or with trembling: and alas! we are more disposed to complain of the trouble which alloys our mercies, than to be thankful for the mercies themselves. But while we learn from the example before us, to watch and pray against partial and inordinate attachments, the indulgence or neglect of our children, and the unadvised language and passionate wishes of excessive grief; while we learn to bow down to the righteous appointments of God in our sharpest trials, to adore his unmerited mercy in our comforts and deliverances, and to prefer the public welfare to any personal or private affections; we may in David perceive a shadow of the Savior's love, who wept, prayed, and suffered death in all its bitterness, for us rebels and enemies, without even excepting those, who persecuted and crucified Him; and hence learn 'not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good.'

Verse 33.

David's grief was doubtless excessive, and very imprudent and criminal. But he was a man of warm passions: he had inordinately loved a very unworthy object, who was cut off in the midst of his crimes: he could not but think of the state of his immortal soul; and vainly hoped, that if he had been preserved, he might have repented: he was conscious that, when his own forfeited life was spared, after his adultery and murder, this burden had been laid on his family. he considered himself, by his transgression, example, and the chastisement of God, as accessory to the dire catastrophe; and in the vehemency of his grief he wished, that he had died himself rather than his son, probably, as being better prepared for the eternal world; while the agitation of his mind prevented him from adverting to the fatal effects of such an event to his kingdom, and to that cause which in his calmer hours was nearest to his heart. 3 And the people gat them by stealth that day [e] into the city, as people being ashamed [d] steal away when they flee in battle.

4 But the king [e] covered his face, and the king cried with a loud voice, [f] O my son, Absalom! O Absalom, my son, my son!

5 And Joab came into the house to the king, and said, Thou hast shamed this day the faces of all thy servants, which this day have [g] saved thy life, and the lives of thy sons, and of thy daughters, and the lives of thy wives, and the lives of thy concubines;

6 * In that thou lovest thine enemies, and hatest thy friends: for thou hast declared this day, that † thou regardest neither princes nor servants: for this day I perceive, that if Absalom had lived, and all we had died this day, [h] then it had pleased thee well.

7 Now therefore arise, go forth, and speak ‡ comfortably unto thy servants: for I swear by the LORD, if thou go not forth, [i] there will not tarry one with thee this night; and that will be worse unto thee, than [j] all the evil that befell thee from thy youth until now.

8 Then the king arose, and [k] sat in the gate. And they told unto all the people, saying, Behold, the king doth sit in the gate. And all the people came before the king: [l] for Israel had fled every man to his tent.

10 And Absalom, [p] whom we anointed over us, [q] is dead in battle: now therefore why §speak ye not a word of bringing the king back?

11 And king David [r] sent to Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, saying, [s] Speak unto the elders of Judah, saying, [t] Why are ye the last to bring the king back to his house? seeing the speech of all Israel is come to the king, even to his house.

12 Ye are my brethren, ye are [u] my bones and my flesh; wherefore then are ye the last to bring back the king?

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 9—15. David would not appear to reign by force of arms: and therefore waited till publicly invited to the government. From the time he began to reign in Hebron over the tribe of Judah only, the distinction between Judah and Israel began to be observed. (2:4. 5:1—3.)—Amasa, having headed so daring a rebellion, was not a proper person to supplant Joab, whose influence with the army and with David's best friends, was too firmly established to be thus shaken; and he was sure not to submit quietly to such a disgrace. David therefore does not seem to have acted with prudence on this emergency. SCOTT.

(14.) 'Appear to distrust those you have some reason to suspect, and you increase their caution and distrust. Put as much confidence in them as you safely can; and this will not fail to excite their confidence toward you.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

V. 9—15. It is strange David did not immediately march back to Jerusalem, to regain possession of his capital city, while the rebels were all in confusion, and before they could rally again: but, 1. He would come back, with the consent and approbation of the people, and not forcing his way: he would restore their liberties, and not take occasion to seize them, or encroach on them. 2. He would come back in peace and safety, and be sure he should meet with no difficulty or opposition in his return; therefore he would first be satisfied the people were well affected to him. 3. He would come back in honor, and like himself; therefore not at the head of his forces, but in the arms of his subjects; the prince that has wisdom and goodness enough to make himself his people's darling, without doubt, looks greater, and makes a much better figure, than the prince that has strength enough to make himself his people's terror.

It is resolved, therefore, David must be brought back with some ceremony.

I. The men of Israel (i. e. the ten tribes) first talked of it, v. 9, 10. The people were at strife about it; it was the great subject of discourse and dispute throughout all the country. Some perhaps opposed it; others appeared zealous for it. Perhaps this was all the strife among them, not a dispute whether the king should be brought back or no, but whose fault it was, that it was not done; as is usual in such cases, every one justified himself, and blamed his neighbor. The people laid the fault on the elders, and the elders on the people, and one tribe on another. Mutual excitements to do a good work are laudable, but not mutual accusations for not doing it; usually when public services are neglected, all sides must share in the blame; each might do more than he does, in reformation of manners, healing of divisions, and the like.

II. The men of Judah, by David's contrivance, were the first that did it. Strange, that they, being David's own tribe, were not so forward as the rest. David had intelligence of the good disposition of all the rest, but nothing from Judah, though he had always been particularly careful of them. We do not always find the most kindness from those we have most reason to expect it from. Yet David would not return till he knew the sense of his own tribe.

1. He employs Zadok and Abiathar, the two chief priests, to treat with the elders of Judah, and to excite them to give the king an invitation back, even to his house, which was the glory of their tribe, v. 11, 12. No men more proper to 15 So the king returned, and came to Jordan. And Judah came to [b] Gilgal to go to meet the king, to conduct the king over Jordan.

[Practical Observations.]

16 ¶ And [c] Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite, which was of Bahurim, [d] hasted and came down with the men of Judah to meet king David.

17 And there were a thousand men of Benjamin with him, and [e] Ziba the servant of the house of Saul, and his fifteen sons and his twenty servants with him; and they went over Jordan before the king.

18 And there went over a ferry-boat to carry over the king's household, and to do [*] what he thought good. And Shimei the son of Gera [f] fell down before the king, as he was come over Jordan;

19 And [g] said unto the king, [h] Let not my lord impute iniquity unto me, neither do thou [i] remember that which thy servant [k] did perversely, the day that my lord the king went out of Jerusalem, that the king should [l] take it to his heart.

20 For thy servant doth know that I have sinned; therefore, behold, [m] I am come the first this day of all the house of [n] Joseph, to go negotiate this affair—firm to David's interest, prudent men, and of great influence with the people. Perhaps the men of Judah were thus remiss, because nobody put them on to it, and then it was proper to stir them up. Many will follow, who, in a good work, will not lead: Or, perhaps, they were so sensible of the greatness of their provocation to David, by joining with Absalom, that they were afraid to bring him back, despairing of his favor; he therefore warrants his agents to assure them of it, with this reason, 'Ye are my brethren, my bone and my flesh, therefore I cannot be severe with you.' The Son of David has been pleased to call us brethren, which encourages us to hope we shall find favor with Him. Or, perhaps, they were willing to see what the rest of the tribes would do, before they stirred, with which they are here upbraided. Note, We should be stirred up to what is great and good, by the examples both of our ancestors and of our neighbors, and by the consideration of our rank. Let not the first in dignity be last in duty.

2. He particularly courts into his interest Amasa, who had been Absalom's general, but was his own nephew as well as Joab, v. 13. Sometimes there is nothing lost in purchasing the friendship of one that has been an enemy. Amasa's interest might do David good service at this juncture. But if David did wisely for himself in designating Amasa for this post, (Joab being now grown intolerably haughty,) he did not do kindly by Amasa in letting his design be known, for it occasioned his death by Joab's hand, ch. 20: 10.

3. The point was hereby gained. He bowed the heart of the men of Judah to vote, unanimously, for the recall of the king, v. 14. David stirred not till he received this invitation, then he came as far back as Jordan, at which river they were to meet him, v. 15. Our Lord Jesus will rule in those that invite Him to the throne in their hearts, and not till He is invited. He first bows the heart, and makes it willing in the day of his power, then rules in the midst of his enemies, Ps. 110: 2, 3.

V. 16—23. Perhaps Jordan was never passed with so much solemnity, nor with so many remarkable occurrences, as now, since Israel passed it under Joshua. David, in his afflictive flight, remembered God particularly from the land of Jordan, (Ps. 42: 6.) and now that land, more than any other, was graced with the glories of his return. David's soldiers furnished themselves with accommodations for their passage over this river, but, for his own family, a ferry-boat was sent on purpose, v. 18. A fleet of boats, say some; a bridge of boats was made, say others; the best convenience they had to serve him with.

Two remarkable persons met him on the banks of Jordan, who had abused him wretchedly when he was in his flight.

I. Ziba, ch. 16: 4. A greater abuse he could not have done him, than, by imposing on his credulity, to draw him in to do a thing so unkind to the son of his friend Jonathan. He comes now, with a retinue of sons and servants, to meet the king, (v. 17.) that he might obtain the king's favor, and so come off the better, when Mephibosheth would shortly undeceive him, and clear himself, v. 26.

II. Shimei, ch. 16: 5. If David had been defeated, no doubt, he would have continued to trample on him, and have gloried in what he had done; but now he sees him in triumph, he thinks it his interest to make his peace with him. Those who now slight and abuse the Son of David, would be glad to make their peace too, when He shall come in his glory; but it will be too late. Shimei, to recommend himself, 1. Came with good company, the men of Judah. 2. He brought a regiment of the men of Benjamin with him, offer-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. The excessive indulgence of any passion, (grief by no means excepted,) not only offends God, but betrays men into great imprudence even in their temporal concerns.—Many allow that such and such things should be done, and wonder that others do not set about them; and yet they themselves are equally dilatory, through indolence, pride, covetousness, &c.—Ministers should at all times be examples of fidelity to magistrates and rulers; and may very properly exhort others to do their plain and evident duty, in that as well as in other respects: but, this case excepted, it is generally best for them not to intermeddle in public affairs.—Convincing arguments, urged in mildness and love, are very forcible, and produce great effects on the minds of men in all temporal concerns: but the grace of God alone can bow our hearts into submission to his humbling truth and holy will.—In acts of clemency to those who have been open offenders, care should be taken not to disgust such as have deserved better of us, though in some respects they have failed of their duty: and that which exposes a man to envy or rivalship, however splendid and valuable, will probably be injurious to him. (1 Sam. 18:6—11. Prov. 27:4.)—Self-preference and contempt of others should always be guarded against; and every thing avoided which may be thought to spring from these evils: while equity, mutual respect, and harmony should be studied, and many interests and supposed points of honor receded from, that strife and contention may be excluded. Ferry-boat.] Heb. haabarah, something affording passage. A cut is given of an ancient Egyptian boat, delineated upon the monuments of El Kab, or Elythia. 'The Egyptian boats were of various kinds. The larger ones [such as this, perhaps, for David and his family] were built of acacia planks, fastened by bolts and nails upon strong ribs; with a large, square sail. Their long rudder was suspended on a sort of mast or wooden pillar; and according to the direction of a type, held by the steersman, it slided to the right and left, along the edge of a broad squared recess at the stern, the pillar being the centre on which it turned. They frequently had chains, or rudder bands fastened to the blade. They were also furnished with large oars, supported and moving on thowl-pins; and, except in galleys of war, the men generally pulled standing, or rose to the stroke. Smaller boats had a rudder on each side, which like the former consisted of a long, broad blade, and still longer handle, the rope serving for a tiller.' WILKINSON. ED.

Verses 19—23.

Next to the tribe of Judah, the descendants of Joseph had the pre-eminence; and Israel, as distinguished from Judah, was named from them. Shimei, therefore, though a Benjamite, ranked himself among the sons of Joseph, or the Israelites; and intimated, that none except the men of Judah had come to David so soon as he had. Perhaps he meant, that he had come before any of the house of Joseph.—Shimei confessed his crime, and seemed penitent: and David granted him a pardon, and swore to him that he should not die, at that time, or for that offence. (16:5—14. 1 K. 2:8, 9, 36—46.) SCOTT.

down to meet my lord the king.

21 But Abishai the son of Zeruiah answered and said, [o] Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he [p] cursed the LORD's anointed?

22 And David said, [q] What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah, that ye should this day be adversaries unto me? [r] shall there any man be put to death this day in Israel? for do not I know that I am this day king over Israel?

23 Therefore the king said unto Shimei, [s] Thou shalt not die: and the king [t] sware unto him.

24 ¶ And [u] Mephibosheth the son of Saul came down to meet the king; and had neither [x] dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor washed his clothes, from the day the king departed until the day he came again in peace.

25 And it came to pass, when he was come to Jerusalem to meet the king, that the king said unto him, [y] Wherefore wentest thou not with me, Mephibosheth?

26 And he answered, My lord, O king, my servant deceived me: for thy servant said, [z] I will saddle me an ass, that I may ride thereon, and go to the king; because [a] thy servant is lame.

27 And he hath [b] slandered thy servant unto my lord the king; but my lord the king is [c] as an angel of God: do therefore what is good in thine eyes.

28 For all of my father's house [d] were but [*] dead men before my lord the king; yet [e] didst thou set thy servant among them that did eat at thine own table: what right therefore have I yet [f] to cry any more unto the king?

29 And the king said unto him; [g] Why speakest thou any more of thy matters? I have said, [h] Thou and Ziba divide the land.

30 And Mephibosheth said unto the king, [i] Yea, let him take all, forasmuch as my lord the king is come again in peace unto his own house.

ing his own and their service; or, perhaps, they were volunteers, whom by his interest he had got togetl er to meet the king, which was the more obliging, because of all the tribes of Israel, there were none, except these and Judah, that appeared to pay him this respect. 3. What he did, he hastened to do; he lost no time; Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way.

He submits, v. 18—20. The offence was public, therefore so is his submission. He owns his crime, aggravates it, begs the king's pardon, and intimates, it was below the king's great and generous mind to deal with him as he deserved; he pleads his early return to his allegiance, and that he came first, that by his example of duty, the rest might be disposed, and by his experience of the king's clemency, the rest might be encouraged, to follow.

A motion is made for judgment against him; v. 21. by Abishai, who would have ventured his life to have been his death, when he was cursing, ch. 16: 9. David did not think fit to have it done then, because his judicial power was cut short; but now that it was restored, why should not the law have its course? Abishai herein consulted what he supposed to be David's feelings more than his true interest. Princes have need to arm themselves against temptations to severity.

But David rejected Abishai's motion with displeasure; v. 22, 23. The less we have to do with those who are of an angry, revengeful spirit, and who put us on doing what is harsh and rigorous, the better. Those who advise us to what is wrong, are really Satans, adversaries, to us. 1. They were adversaries to his inclination, which was now to clemency. It is the glory of kings to forgive those that humble and surrender themselves. His joy inclined him to forgive: joyful days should be forgiving days. Yet this was not all; his experience of God's mercy, in restoring him to his kingdom, his exclusion from which, he attributed to his sin, inclined him to show mercy to Shimei. They that are forgiven, must forgive. David had severely revenged the abuses done his ambassadors by the Ammonites, (ch. 12: 31.) but easily passes by the abuse done himself by an Israelite. That was an affront to Israel in general, and touched the honor of his crown and kingdom; this was purely personal, and therefore he could the more easily forgive it. 2. They were adversaries to his interest: if he should put Shimei to death, who cursed him, they would expect the same fate, who had taken up arms, and actually levied war against him, which would drive them from him, while he was endeavoring to draw them to him. Acts of severity are seldom acts of policy: The throne is established by mercy.

V. 24—30. Mephibosheth's case is next to be inquired into, and he himself brings it on.

1. He went down in the crowd to meet the king, (v. 24.) and, as a proof of the sincerity of his joy in the king's return, we are here told what a true mourner he was for the king's banishment. During that melancholy time, Mephibosheth continued in a very melancholy state. In times of public calamity, we ought to abridge ourselves of the delights of sense, in conformity to the season. There are times when God calls to weeping and mourning, and we must comply with the call.

2. When the king came to Jerusalem, (since he could not sooner have an opportunity,) he made his appearance before him, v. 25. The king asked him, why he, being one of his family, had stayed behind, and he opened his case fully. (1.) He complains of Ziba, his servant, who should have been his friend, but had been, two ways, his enemy: first, he hindered him from going with the king, by taking the ass himself, which he was ordered to make ready for his master, (v. 26.) and, secondly, he had accused him to David of a design to usurp the government, v. 27. How much mischief is it in the power of a wicked servant to do to the best master! (2.) He gratefully acknowledges the king's great kindness to himself, when he and all his father's house lay at the king's mercy, v. 28. This shows Ziba's suggestion was improbable: for could Mephibosheth be so foolish as to aim higher, when he lived so easily, so happily? And could he be so very disingenuous, as to design any harm to David, of whose great kindness he was thus sensible? (3.) He refers himself to the king's pleasure, depending on the king's wisdom, and his ability to discern between truth and falsehood, and disclaiming all pretensions of his own merit.—We were all as dead men before God; yet He has not only spared us, but taken us to sit at his table. How little reason then have we to complain of any trouble we are in: and how much reason to take all well that God does.

3. David hereupon recalls the sequestration of Mephibosheth's estate; being deceived in his grant, he revokes it, and confirms his former settlement of it; I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land; (v. 29.) i. e. 'Let it be as I first ordered it.' ch. 9: 10. Thus Mephibosheth is where he was, no harm is done, only Ziba goes away unpunished for his false and malicious information against his master; David either feared him too much, or loved him too well, to do justice on him according to that law, Deut. 19: 18, 19. and he was now in the humor of forgiving, and resolved to make every body easy.

4. Mephibosheth drowns all his cares about his estate, in his joy for the king's return, v. 30. A good man can contentedly bear his own private losses and disappointments, while he sees Israel in peace, and the throne of the Son of David exalted and established.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—30. Many seem to be sorry for those crimes, which expose them to present punishment; and the language and semblance of repentance are easily imitated: but it is safest for us to judge favorably of others; if we do err, to err on the side of candor and clemency; and to leave it to the heart-searching God, to determine between the upright and the hypocritical.—Peculiar mercies from God should dispose us to be the more merciful to others: and our best friends must be considered as adversaries, when they would persuade us to act contrary to conscience and duty. (Matt. 16:21—23.)—Perseverance in well doing will at length refute slanderous accusations;—credulity in believing slanders often leads pious persons into difficulties, and covers them with shame: no offenders are so seldom treated with proper severity as backbiters. SCOTT.

Verses 24—30.

Mephibosheth did not come to David till his return to Jerusalem, probably, because he could not procure an ass prepared for him to ride on; having been deserted by Ziba, and all his attendants. Whether David did not fully credit Mephibosheth; or whether he was ashamed of his credulity, and wished not to have it further noticed; he suffered Ziba to escape merited punishment, and to enjoy part of the fruits of his slander: or at least he contented himself with restoring matters to their former settlement, as some understand it. (Note, 9 9—11.) SCOTT.

31 ¶ And [j] Barzillai the Gileadite came down from Rogelim, and went over Jordan with the king, to conduct him over Jordan.

32 Now Barzillai was a very aged man, even [k] fourscore years old: and he had [l] provided the king of sustenance while he lay at Mahanaim; [m] for he was a very great man.

33 And the king said unto Barzillai, [n] Come thou over with me, and I will feed thee with me in Jerusalem.

34 And Barzillai said unto the king, [*] How long have I to live, that I should go up with the king unto Jerusalem?

35 I am this day fourscore years old: and [o] can I discern between good and evil? can thy servant [p] taste what I eat or what I drink? [q] can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? wherefore then should thy servant be yet a [r] burden unto my lord the king?

36 Thy servant will go a little way over Jordan with the king: and why should the king recompense it me with such a reward?

37 Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that [s] I may die in mine own city, and be buried [t] by the grave of my father and of my mother. But, behold thy servant [u] Chimham; let him go over with my lord the king; and do to him what shall seem good unto thee.

V. 31—39. David had already graced the triumphs of his restoration with the generous remission of injuries; we have him here gracing them with the no less generous reward of kindnesses. Barzillai, the Gileadite, who had a noble seat at Rogelim, not far from Mahanaim, was the man who, of all the nobility and gentry of that country, had been most kind to David in his distress.

Here is, I. His great respect to David, not only as a good man, but as his rightful sovereign, v. 32. God had given him a large estate, and, it seems, he had a large heart to do good with it: what else but that, is a large estate good for? To reduced greatness, generosity obliges us, and to oppressed goodness, piety obliges us, to be in a particular manner kind, to the utmost of our power. Barzillai, to show he was not weary of David, though so great a charge to him, attended him to Jordan, and went over with him, v. 31. Let subjects learn hence, to render tribute to whom tribute is due, and honor to whom honor, Rom. 13: 7.

II. The kind invitation David gave him to court, v. 33. 1. That he might have the pleasure of his company, and the benefit of his counsel; for we may suppose he was very wise and good, as well as very rich, else he had not been called here a very great man; for it is what a man is, more than what he has, that bespeaks him truly great. 2. That he might have an opportunity of returning his kindness. David did not take Barzillai's kindness to him as a debt, (he was none of those arbitrary princes, who think that whatever their subjects have, is theirs when they please,) but accepted it and rewarded it as a favor.

III. Barzillai's reply, wherein, 1. He admires the king's generosity, lessening his service, and magnifying the king's return for it, v. 36. He thought he had done himself honor enough, in doing the king any service. Thus, when the saints shall be called to inherit the kingdom, in consideration of what they have done for Christ in this world, they will be amazed at the disproportion between the service and the recompense; (Mat. 25: 37.) Lord, when saw we Thee hungry, and fed Thee?

2. He declines the invitation, begs his majesty's pardon for refusing so generous an offer: he should think himself very happy in being near the king, but, (1.) He is old, and unfit to remove at all, especially to court: old, and unfit for the business of the court; old, and unfit for the diversions of the court, v. 35. As in Moses' time, so in Barzillai's, and now, if men be so strong that they come to fourscore years, their strength then is labor and sorrow. Let those that are old, learn of Barzillai to be dead to the delights of sense; let grace second nature, and make a virtue of the necessity. Nay, Barzillai, being old, thinks he shall burden the king, rather than honor him; and a good man would not be burdensome, or, if he must be so, will rather be so to his own house than to another's. (2.) He is dying, and must begin to think of his long journey, his removal out of the world, v. 37. It is good for us all, but it especially becomes old people, to think and speak much of dying. 'Talk of going to court!' says Barzillai; 'let me go home and die in my own city; the grave is ready for me, let me go and get ready for that.'

3. He desires the king to be kind to his son Chimham; what favor is done to him, Barzilla will take as done to himself. They that are old must not grudge young people those delights which they themselves are past the enjoyment of, nor oblige them to retire as they do.

IV. David's farewell to Barzillai, (v. 39.) signifying that, in gratitude for his kindnesses, he would love him and pray for him; and with a promise, that, whatever request he should at any time make to him, he would be ready to oblige him, v. 48. What is the chief excellency of power, but this, that it gives men a capacity of doing the more good? He takes Chimham forward with him, and leaves it to Barzillai to choose him his preferment, v. 38. And, it should seem, Barzillai, who had experienced the innocency and safety of retirement, begged a country-seat for him near Jerusalem, but not in it; for, long after, we read of a place near Beth-lehem, David's city, which is called, The habitation of Chimham, allotted him, probably, not out of the crown-lands, or the forfeited estates, but David's paternal estate.

V. 40—43. David came over Jordan, attended and assisted by the men of Judah; when advanced as far as Gilgal, the first stage on this side Jordan, half the people of Israel, i. e. of their elders and great men, were come to wait on him, to kiss his hand, and congratulate him on his return, but found they came too late to witness the solemnity of his first entrance. This put them out of humor, and occasioned a quarrel between them and the men of Judah, which was a damp to the joy of the day, and the beginning of further mischief.

Here is, 1. The complaint the men of Israel brought against the men of Judah, v. 41. This reflected on them, as if they were not so well affected to the king and his restoration as the men of Judah were, whereas the king himself knew

V. 31—39. The narrative of the conversation between David and Barzillai, and their affectionate parting, is exceedingly pleasing and instructive; but requiring little comment. Scott. Singing men and singing women.] (35.) 'Besides delicate meats and drinks, we here find that vocal music constituted a principal part of court entertainments: male and female singers made a necessary appendage to these banquets, as they do in most eastern courts [and wealthy houses] to the present day. [Wilkinson remarks, 'at all entertainments the ancient Egyptians had music and dancing, and sometimes buffoons to divert the guests.' Ed.] David the sweet singer, and sublime poet, had doubtless musicians, poets and poetesses at his court: for it is not likely he was the only poet of his time.' Dr. A. Clarke.

Verses 40—43.

The fiercer words, here returned, produced very bad effects. (Judg. 8:1—3. 12:1—7. Prov. 13:10. 17:14. 18:19. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Gal. 5:13—15. Phil. 2:1—4. Jam. 3:13—18.) Scott.

the king, and we have also more right in David than ye: why then did ye * despise us, that [f]our advice should not be first had in bringing back our king? And [g] the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel.

CHAP. XX.

Sheba draws the men of Israel into a revolt, 1,2. David shuts up his ten concubines, 3. Amasa, being sent to call together the men of Judah, is murdered by Joab, who resumes the command and pursues Sheba, 4—13. He besieges Abel, whither Sheba had fled, 14, 15. Through the interposition of a wise woman, Sheba's head is thrown over the wall, and the revolt is terminated, 16—22. David's officers, 23—26.

AND [a]there happened to be there [b]a man of Belial, whose name was Sheba, the son of Bichri, a Benjamite: and [c]he blew a trumpet, and said, [d]We have no part in David, neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: every man to his tents, O Israel.

2 So [e]every man of Israel went up from after David, and followed Sheba the son of Bichri: but [f]the men of Judah clave unto their king, [g]from Jordan even to Jerusalem.

3 And David came to his house at Jerusalem: and the king took the [h]ten women his concubines, that he had left to keep the house, and put them in ward, and fed them, but went not in unto them. So they were shut up unto the day of their death, living in widowhood.

4 Then said the king to Amasa, Assemble me the men of Judah within three days, and be thou here present.

5 So Amasa went to assemble the men of Judah: but he tarried longer than the set time which he had appointed him.

6 And David said to Abishai, Now shall Sheba the son of Bichri do us more harm than did Absalom: take thou thy lord's servants, and pursue after him, lest he get him fenced cities, and escape us.

7 And there went out after him Joab's men, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and all the mighty men: and they went out of Jerusalem, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.

8 When they were at the great stone which is in Gibeon, Amasa went before them. And Joab's garment that he had put on was girded unto him, and upon it a girdle with a sword fastened upon his loins in the sheath thereof; and as he went forth it fell out.

9 And Joab said to Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him.

10 But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand: so he smote him therewith in the fifth rib, and shed out his bowels to the ground, and struck him not again; and he died. So Joab and Abishai his brother pursued after Sheba the son of Bichri.

11 And one of Joab's men stood by him, and said, He that favoureth Joab, and he that is for David, let him go after Joab.

12 And Amasa wallowed in blood in the midst of the highway. And when the man saw that all the people stood still, he removed Amasa out of the highway into the field, and cast a cloth upon him, when he saw that every one that came by him stood still.

13 When he was removed out of the highway, all the people went on after Joab, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.

14 And he went through all the tribes of Israel unto Abel, and to Bethmaacah, and all the Berites: and they were gathered together, and went also after him.

15 And they came and besieged him in Abel of Bethmaacah, and they cast up a bank against the city, and it stood in the trench: and all the people that were with Joab battered the wall, to throw it down.

16 Then cried a wise woman out of the city, Hear, hear; say, I pray you, unto Joab, Come near hither, that I may speak with thee.

17 And when he was come near unto her, the woman said, Art thou Joab? And he answered, I am he. Then she said unto him, Hear the words of thine handmaid. And he answered, I do hear.

18 Then she spake, saying, They were wont to speak in old time, saying, They shall surely ask counsel at Abel: and so they ended the matter.

19 I am one of them that are peaceable and faithful in Israel: thou seekest to destroy a city and a mother in Israel: why wilt thou swallow up the inheritance of the LORD?

20 And Joab answered and said, Far be it, far be it from me, that I should swallow up or destroy.

21 The matter is not so: but a man of mount Ephraim, Sheba the son of Bichri by name, hath lifted up his hand against the king, even against David: deliver him only, and I will depart from the city. And the woman said unto Joab, Behold, his head shall be thrown to thee over the wall.

22 Then the woman went unto all the people in her wisdom. And they cut off the head of Sheba the son of Bichri, and cast it out to Joab. And he blew a trumpet, and they retired from the city, every man to his tent. And Joab returned to Jerusalem unto the king.

23 Now Joab was over all the host of Israel: and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the Cherethites and over the Pelethites:

24 And Adoram was over the tribute: and Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was recorder:

25 And Sheva was scribe: and Zadok and Abiathar were the priests:

26 And Ira also the Jairite was a chief ruler about David.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. How do the clouds return after the rain! No sooner is one of David's troubles over, than another arises, as it were, out of the ashes of the former, wherein the threatening is fulfilled, that the sword should never depart from his house. David, in the midst of his triumphs, has here the affliction to see his kingdom disturbed, and his family disgraced.

I. His subjects revolt at the instigation of a man of Belial, whom they followed when they forsook the man after God's own heart. We must not think it strange, while in this world, if the end of one trouble be the beginning of another: deep sometimes calls unto deep. When a reconciliation is newly made, it ought to be handled with great tenderness and caution, lest the peace break again before it be settled. A broken bone, when it is set, must have time to knit. The ring-leader of this rebellion was Sheba, a Benjamite by birth, (v. 1.) who had his habitation in mount Ephraim, v. 21. Shimei and he were both of Saul's tribe, and both retained the ancient grudge of that house. Against the kingdom of the Messiah there is an hereditary enmity in the serpent's seed, and a succession of attempts to overthrow it; but He that sits in Heaven laughs at them all. The occasion of it was that foolish quarrel, in the close of the foregoing ch. Israel complained to David of the slight Judah put on them; if he had now countenanced their complaint, commended their zeal, and returned them thanks for it, he might have confirmed them in his interest; but he seemed partial to his own tribe: their words prevailed above the words of the men of Israel; as some read the last words of the foregoing ch David inclined to justify them; which when the men of Israel perceived, they flew off with indignation. This Sheba proclaimed, (v. 1.) who, probably, was a man of note, and had been active in Absalom's rebellion; the disgusted Israelites took the hint, and went up from after David to follow Sheba, (v. 2.) i. e. the generality of them did so, only the men of Judah adhered to him.

Learn hence, (1.) Princes and parents should carry it with an even hand. (2.) Those know not what they do, that make light of the affections of their inferiors, by not countenancing and accepting them. Their hatred may be feared, whose love is despised. (3.) The beginning of strife is as the letting forth of water; it is therefore wisdom to leave it off before it be meddled with. How great a matter doth a little of this fire kindle! (4.) To pervert words is to subvert peace: much mischief is made by forcing invidious constructions on what is said and written, and drawing consequences that were never intended. The men of Judah said, The king is near of kin to us, by which, say the men of Israel, you mean, We have no part in him; whereas they meant no such thing. (5.) People are very apt to run into extremes, We have ten parts in David, said they; and almost in the next breath, We have no part in him. To-day, Hosanna, to-morrow, Crucify.

II. His concubines shut up for life, and he himself under the necessity of doing it, because they had been defiled by Absalom, v. 3. David had multiplied wives, contrary to the law, and they proved a grief and shame to him. That Absalom's villany might be buried in oblivion, they must be buried in obscurity. Nay, justice obliged him to shut them up in prison, to punish them for their easy submission to Absalom's lust, despairing, perhaps, of David's return, and giving him up for gone. Let none expect to do ill, and fare well.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31—43. It becomes us, as we advance in life, to relinquish worldly pursuits before we be torn from them; and, leaving to our juniors those scenes of business, or of pleasure, where reflection is too often dissipated, and the voice of conscience stunned, to prefer retirement and privacy, where we may best prepare for the closing hour. And, though allowances should be made to youth, in matters inexpedient to old age; yet the sooner and the more entirely young people devote themselves to God, the safer and happier they will be.—It is our duty to recompense to the children, the kindness shown us by their parents, and to pray for them that they may have grace properly to use their temporal good things.—Envy and anger often interrupt the most promising appearances, and in quarrels generally both parties are culpable. [For both, by showing anger, &c. excite the same propensities in those they dispute with, till reason, and love are drowned. Yet 'a soft answer turns away wrath;' the mildness shown exciting the corresponding and better feelings of the opposite party.]—But here again, some glimpses may be discerned of the glorious character and kingdom of David's Son and David's Lord. Being anointed by the Father to be his King on his holy hill of Zion, He reigns over a willing people, who deem it their privilege to be his subjects. Once indeed they were rebels, and numbers of their associates perished in rebellion: but when they became sensible of their danger, they were fearful or reluctant to submit unto Him; till his ministers, by representing his tender love, and his promises of pardon and preferment, through the concurring influences of his Spirit, bowed their hearts to a humble willingness that He should reign over them: then He readily pardoned and accepted them, and on no accusation will He cast out, or cut off, the greatest offender who cries for his mercy. His friends sincerely mourn when his cause is run down, and rejoice when it prospers, whether they prosper in the world or not. He will recompense those, who from love to Him feed his servants; He will assign them a place in his holy city, the new Jerusalem; He will feast them on the provisions of his house, and will bless their children after them. Alas! that it must be added, that while the King Himself is so plenteous in mercy; many of his professed subjects are envious, and contentious with each other, and quarrel about the most trivial concerns; which prevents much good, does immense mischief, and occasions lamentable scandals. May He at length teach all who are called by his name, to follow the example of his humility and meekness; and to rejoice in seeing the common cause promoted, let who will have the credit of being the instrument: and may all 'endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace!' (Note, Eph. 4:1—6.) SCOTT.

bines, whom he had left to keep the house, and put them in * ward, and fed them, but went not in unto them. So they were † shut up unto the day of their death, ‡ living in widowhood.

4 Then said the king to [i] Amasa, § Assemble me the men of Judah within three days, and be thou here present.

5 So Amasa went to assemble the men of Judah: but he [k] tarried longer than the set time which he had appointed him.

6 And David said to [l] Abishai, Now shall Sheba the son of Bichri [m] do us more harm than did Absalom: take thou [n] thy lord's servants and pursue after him, lest he get him fenced cities and ‖ escape us.

7 And there went out after him [o] Joab's men, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and all the mighty men: and they went out of Jerusalem, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.

8 When they were at the great stone which is [p] in Gibeon, [q] Amasa went before them. And Joab's garment that he had put on was girded [r] unto him, and upon it a girdle with a sword fastened upon his loins in the sheath thereof; and as he went forth it fell out.

9 And Joab said to Amasa, [s] Art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand [t] to kiss him.

10 But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was [u] in Joab's hand: so [v] he smote him therewith in the fifth rib, [x] and shed out his bowels to the ground, and ¶ struck him not again; and he died. So Joab and Abishai his brother pursued after Sheba the son of Bichri.

11 And one of Joab's men stood by him, and said, [y] He that favoreth Joab, and he that is [z] for David, let him go after Joab.

12 And [a] Amasa wallowed in blood in the midst of the highway. And when the man saw that all the people stood still, he removed Amasa out of the highway into the field, and cast a cloth upon him, when he saw that every one that came by him stood still.

13 When he was removed out of the highway, all the people went on after Joab, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.

[Practical Observations.]

V. 4—13. We have here Amasa's fall, just as he began to rise. I. He has a commission to raise forces to suppress Sheba's rebellion, and is ordered to do it with all possible expedition, v. 4. It seems, the men of Judah, though forward to attend the king's triumphs, were backward enough to fight his battles; most love a loyalty, as well as a religion, that is cheap and easy. Many boast of being akin to Christ, that yet are very loath to venture for Him. Amasa finds Judah so backward and unready, that he cannot do it within the time appointed, (v. 5.) though his promotion, who had been their general under Absalom, was very agreeable, and a proof of the clemency of David's government.

II. Upon Amasa's delay, Abishai, the brother of Joab, is ordered to take the guards and standing forces, and with them to pursue Sheba, (v. 6, 7.) for nothing could be of more dangerous consequence than to give him time. David gives these orders to Abishai, because he resolves to mortify Joab, and degrade him, not so much, I doubt, for the blood of Abner, which he shed basely, as for the blood of Absalom. Joab, without orders, though in disgrace, goes with his brother, knowing he might be serviceable to the public, or perhaps now meditating the removal of his rival.

III. Joab, near Gibeon, meets Amasa, and barbarously murders him, v. 8—10. It should seem, the great stone in Gibeon was the place appointed for the general rendezvous: there the rivals met; and Amasa, relying on his commission, went before, as general both of the new-raised forces which he had got together, and of the veteran troops Abishai had brought in; but Joab girds his coat about him, that that might not hang in his way, and girds his belt on his coat, that his sword might be the readier; he puts his sword in a sheath too big for it, that, whenever he pleased, it might, on a little shake, fall out, as if by accident, and so he take it into his hand, unsuspected, as if to return it into the scabbard, when he designed to sheath it in the bowels of Amasa. The more there is of plot in a sin, the worse it is. He did it treacherously, and under pretence of friendship, that Amasa might not be on his guard. He called him brother, (they were own cousins,) inquired of his welfare, and took him by the beard, as one he was free with, to kiss him, while with

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. We must expect one trial after another, for our salutary chastisement, till we reach the place where sin and sorrow are for ever excluded.—Angry disputants commonly misunderstand, or misinterpret, one another's words: proud men will either manage every thing their own way, or entirely refuse their concurrence; and when greatly enraged, they are apt to avenge themselves on the innocent, and on persons whom they profess to love, instead of those who have affronted them.—Many a vehement quarrel would spend its fury in angry words, and then die away, if some 'man of Belial' were not present, to sound the trumpet of public contention. Satan, if permitted,—will be sure to excite such ringleaders of dissension: and God, in wise and holy sovereignty, is pleased often to permit it, that He may execute vengeance, or inflict correction, according to his righteous purposes. Hence nations are visited with war and bloodshed, especially the dire scourge of civil wars; and the church with pestilent divisions, and virulent controversies.—When immoderate and inexpedient provision is made for sensual gratification, it will surely terminate in grief and shame: and obscure retirement best suits those who are become infamous by sin.—The most powerful cannot effect all that they wish, or all that they see to be right; nay, they cannot attempt it without danger: for at last they can only do, what the many can be prevailed with to concur in.—By degrees men grow more and more bold and unfeeling in the commission of crimes of every kind; until they vindicate and glory in their villanies: and when such daring offenders are actuated by ambition or revenge, they will not be restrained by the ties of relationship, or friendship; nay, they will employ the guise and language of love, to obtain the opportunity of perpetrating the most atrocious murders.—The murderer may conceal his crimes, or prosper in his ways for a season, and elude or outbrave the justice of man: but let him not expect to escape the vengeance of God.—Vain are earthly distinctions and preferments, which excite so much envy and enmity, without affording any additional security to man's uncertain life: may we then be ambitious 'of that honor which cometh from God only!'—Great abilities, strong attachment to the interests of the public, and eminent services, performed with firmness, prudence, and clemency, constitute a great, but not always a good man: and a person thus peculiarly distinguished, being the slave of one imperious lust, may violate every moral obligation in order to its indulgence; though such treachery, cruelty, and injustice seem to 'be far from him,' in other parts of his conduct. Amasa's appointment to be commander of the army, in the place of Joab, must have been unpopular with all who had fought and conquered under that commander: and as Amasa had not been successful for Absalom, perhaps his own party did not entirely confide in him. This might occasion unexpected delay in raising an army. SCOTT.

Verses 11—13.

By the artifice of representing the cause of Joab as united with that of David, the people in general were left in suspense, whether Joab acted by the king's orders, or against them: but when the body of Amasa was removed and covered, they followed their old commander without further hesitation. SCOTT.

14 ¶ And he went through all the tribes of Israel unto [b] Abel, and to Beth-maachah, and all the [c] Berites: and they were gathered together, and went also after him.

15 And they came and besieged him in Abel of Beth-maachah, and they [d] cast up a bank against the city, and * it stood in the trench: and all the people that were with Joab † battered the wall to throw it down.

16 Then cried [e] a wise woman out of the city, Hear, hear; say, I pray you, unto Joab, Come near hither, that I may speak with thee.

17 And when he was come near unto her, the woman said, Art thou Joab? and he answered, I am he. Then she said unto him, [f] Hear the words of thine handmaid. And he answered, I do hear.

18 Then she spake, saying, ‡ They were wont to speak in old time, saying, They shall surely ask counsel at Abel: and so they ended the matter.

19 I am one of them that are [g] peaceable and faithful in Israel: thou seekest to destroy a city and [h] a mother in Israel: why wilt thou [i] swallow up [k] the inheritance of the LORD?

20 And Joab answered and said, [l] Far be it, far be it from me, [m] that I should swallow up or destroy.

21 The matter is not so: but [n] a man of mount Ephraim, Sheba the son of Bichri § by name, hath [o] lifted up his hand against the king, even against David: deliver him only, and I will depart from the city. And the woman said unto Joab, Behold, [p] his head shall be thrown to thee over the wall.

22 Then the woman went unto all the people [q] in her wisdom. And they cut off the head of Sheba the son of Bichri, and cast it out to Joab: and [r] he blew a trumpet, and they ‖ retired from the city, every man to his tent. [s] And Joab returned to Jerusalem unto the king.

23 ¶ Now [t] Joab was over all the host of Israel: [u] and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the Cherethites, and over the Pelethites:

the drawn sword in his other hand he was aiming at his heart. Was this done like a gentleman, a soldier, a general? No, but like a villain, a base coward. Just thus he slew Abner, and went unpunished for it, which encouraged him to do the like again. He did it impudently, not in a corner, but at the head of his troops, in their sight, as one so hardened in blood and murders, that he could neither blush nor tremble. He did it in contempt and defiance of David, and the commission given Amasa: that commission was the only ground of his quarrel with him; so David was struck at through Amasa, and, in effect, told to his face, that Joab would be general, in spite of him. This ill-timed quarrel might have scattered their forces, or engaged them one against another, and so have made them all an easy prey to Sheba. So contentedly could Joab sacrifice the interest both of king and kingdom to his personal revenge.

IV. Joab immediately resumes his general's place, and leads on the army in pursuit of Sheba, that, if possible, he might prevent any prejudice to the common cause by what he had done. 1. He leaves one of his men to proclaim to the forces coming up, that they were still engaged in David's cause, but under Joab's command, v. 11. He knew his interest in the soldiery, and how many favored him, rather than Amasa, that had been a traitor, was now a turn-coat, and had never been successful; on this he boldly relied, and called them all to follow him. But one would wonder with what face a murderer could pursue a traitor; and how, under such heavy guilt, he had courage to enter on danger; his conscience was seared with a hot iron. 2. Care is taken to remove the dead body out of the way, because at that they made a stand, (as ch. 2: 23.) and to cover it with a cloth, v. 12, 13. Wicked men think themselves safe in their wickedness, if they can but conceal it from the eye of the world: if it be hidden, it is with them as if it were never done. But the covering of blood with a cloth cannot stop its cry in God's ear for vengeance, or make it the less loud. However, since this was no time to arraign Joab for what he had done, and the common safety called for expedition, it was prudent to remove what retarded the march of the army.

V. 14—22. We have here the conclusion of Sheba's attempt.

I. The rebel, when he had rambled over all the tribes of Israel, and found them not so willing, on second thoughts, to follow him, as they had been, on a sudden provocation, to desert David, (having only picked up a few like himself,) entered Abel Beth-maachah, a strong city in the N. in the lot of Naphtali, 2 K. 15: 29. Here he took shelter, whether by force, or with consent, does not appear, but his adherents were mostly Berites of Beeroth in Benjamin, v. 14. One bad man will find and make more.

II. Joab drew up all his force against the city, besieged it, battered the wall, and made ready for a general storm, v. 15. Justly is that place attacked with all this fury, which dares harbor a traitor; nor will that heart fare better, which indulges those rebellious lusts that will not have Christ to reign over them.

III. A discreet good woman of the city of Abel brings this matter, by her prudent management, to a good issue, so as to satisfy Joab, and yet save the city. Souls know no difference of sexes; though the man be the head, it does not therefore follow that he has the monopoly of the brains, therefore he ought not to have the monopoly of the crown; many a masculine heart, and more than masculine, has been found in a female breast; nor is the treasure of wisdom the less valuable for being lodged in the weaker vessel.

In the treaty between this nameless heroine and Joab, 1. She gains his audience and attention, v. 16, 17. 2. She reasons with him on behalf of her city, and very ingeniously. It was a city famous for wisdom, (v. 18.) as we translate it; she pleads, the city had been long in such reputation for prudent, knowing men, that it was the common referee of the country, and all agreed to abide by the award of its elders. Now, shall such a city be laid in ashes, and never treated with? The inhabitants were generally peaceable and faithful in Israel, v. 19. She could speak, not for herself only, but for all whose cause she pleaded, that they were not turbulent, seditious spirits, but of known fidelity, and peaceableness; neither seditious, nor litigious. It was a mother in Israel, a guide and nurse to the towns and country about; a part of the inheritance of the Lord, a city of Israelites; not of heathens; the destruction of which would lessen and weaken the nation God had chosen for his heritage. They expected him to offer them peace, before he made an attack on them, according to that known law of war, Deut. 20: 10. So the margin reads, v. 18. They plainly spake in the beginning, (of the siege,) saying, Surely they will ask of Abel; i. e. 'The besiegers will demand the traitor, and ask us to surrender him; and if so, we will soon come to an agreement, and so end the matter.'

3. Joab and Abel's advocate soon agree, that Sheba's head shall be the ransom of the city. Joab, though, in a personal quarrel, he had lately swallowed up and destroyed Amasa, yet, when he acts as a general, will by no means bear the imputation, v. 20. A great deal of mischief would be prevented, if contending parties would but understand one another. The single condition of peace, is, the surrender of the traitor; it is so in God's dealing with the soul, when it is besieged by conviction and distress; sin is the traitor; the beloved lust is the rebel: part with that, cast away the transgressions, and all shall be well. No peace on any other terms. Our wise woman immediately agrees to the proposal.

She went to the citizens in her wisdom, (and perhaps had as much need of it in dealing with them, as with Joab,) and persuaded them to cut off Sheba's head, probably, by some public order of their government, and it was thrown over the wall to Joab who knew the traitor's face.

V. 23—26. Here is an account of the state of David's court, after his restoration. Joab was continued general, being too great to be displaced, Benaiah, as before, captain of the guards. One new office is erected, which we had not, ch. 8: 16. that of treasurer, or one over the tribute, for it was not till toward the latter end of his time, that he began to raise taxes. Adoram was long in this office, but it cost him his life at last, 1 K. 12: 18.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1—9. The date of the events of this ch. is uncertain. I incline to think they happened as here placed, after Absalom's and Sheba's rebellion, and toward the latter end of David's reign. That the battles with the Philistines, mentioned here, were long after the Philistines were subdued, appears by comp. 1 Chr. 18: 1. with ch. 20: 4. The numbering of the people was just before the fixing of the place of the temple, (as appears, 1 Chr. 22: 1.) which was toward the close of David's life; and, it should seem, the people were numbered just before the three years' famine for the Gibeonites, for what is threatened as three years' famine, 1 Chr. 21: 12. is called seven years, 2 Sam. 24: 12, 13. Three more, with the year current, added to those three.

Here is, I. The injury Saul, long before this, did to the Gibeonites, which we had no account of in the history of his reign, nor should have heard of here, but that it came now to be reckoned for. The Gibeonites were of the remnant of the Amorites, (v. 2.) who by a wile had made peace with Israel, and had the public faith pledged to them by Joshua for their safety. See Josh. 9: 23. It does not appear they had broken their part of the covenant, nor was it pretended; but Saul, under color of zeal for the honor of Israel, that it might not be said they had any of the natives among them, aimed to root them out, and so slew many. What made this an exceeding sinful sin, was, that he not only shed innocent blood, but therein violated the solemn oath which bound the nation to protect them. See what brought ruin on Saul's house; it was a bloody house.

II. Israel chastised with a sore famine, long after, for this sin of Saul. 1. Even in the land of Israel, that fruitful land, and in the reign of David, that glorious reign, there was a famine, great drought, and scarcity of provisions, for three years together. If corn miss one year, commonly the next makes up the deficiency; but if three successively, it will be a sore judgment; and the man of wisdom will by it hear God's voice crying to the country, to repent of the abuse of plenty. 2. David inquired of God concerning it. Though himself a prophet, he must consult the oracle, and know God's mind in his own appointed way. Note, When under God's judgments, we ought to inquire into the grounds of the controversy. Lord, show me wherefore Thou contendest with me. It is strange David did not sooner consult the oracle; but, perhaps, till now, he apprehended it not to be an extraordinary judgment for some particular sin. Even good men are often remiss in duty. We continue in ignorance, and mistake, because we delay to inquire. 3. God was ready to answer, though David was slow to inquire. It is for Saul. Note, God's judgments often look a great way back, which obliges us to do so, when under his rebukes. It is not for us to object against the people's smarting for the sin of their king, perhaps they were aiding and abetting; nor against this generation's suffering for the sin of the last; God often visiteth the sins of the fathers upon the children, and his judgments are a great deep; He gives not account of any of his matters. Time does not wear out the guilt of sin; nor can we build hopes of impunity on the delay of judgments. There is no statute of limitation to be pleaded against God's demands. God may punish when He pleases.

III. Vengeance taken on the house of Saul, to turn away God's wrath.

1. David, probably by divine direction, referred it to the Gibeonites themselves, to prescribe what satisfaction should be given them, v. 3. They had many years remained silent, but now, at length, God speaks for them; I heard not, for Thou wilt hear; (Ps. 38: 14, 15.) and they are recompensed for their patience with this honor, that they are made judges in their own cause, v. 3, 4. It is sad for any family or nation to have the prayers of oppressed innocency against them; therefore the expense of a just restitution is well bestowed, to retrieve the blessing of those that were ready to perish. Those understand not themselves, that value not the prayers of the poor and despised.

2. They desire that seven of Saul's posterity be put to death, and David grants it.

(1.) They required no silver, nor gold, v. 4. Money is no satisfaction for blood; see Num. 35: 31—33. It is the ancient law, Blood calls for blood, Gen. 9: 6. The Gibeonites had now a fair opportunity to get a discharge from their servitude, according to the equity of that law, If a man strike out his servant's eye, he shall let him go free for his eye's sake. But they did not insist on this; they were Nethinim, given to God and his people Israel, and they would not seem weary of the service.

(2.) They required no lives but of Saul's family. We sue the heirs for the parent's debts; men may not extend that so far as life, Deut. 24: 16. The children, in an ordinary course of law, shall never be put to death for the parents, but this case was extraordinary. God had made Himself an immediate party to the cause, and, no doubt, put it into the heart of the Gibeonites to make this demand, for He owned what was done, (v. 14.) and his judgments are not subject to the rules which men's judgments must be subject to. Let parents take heed of sin, especially the sin of cruelty and oppression, for their poor children's sake, who may be smarting for it by the just hand of God, when they are in their graves. It should seem, Saul's posterity trod in his steps, for it is called a bloody house: it was the spirit of the family, therefore they are justly reckoned with for his sin, as well as for their own.

(3.) They would not impose it on David to do this execution, (v. 4, 6.) that if there were any hardship in it, they might bear the blame, and not David or his house. By our old law, if a murderer had judgment given against him on an appeal, the relations that appealed, had the executing of him [so among the Arabs, &c. now].

(4.) They did not require this, out of malice against Saul or his family, then they would have moved it themselves long before, but out of love

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—26. Wisdom is not restricted to rank or sex: and it does not consist in extensive knowledge, or ingenious speculations; but in understanding how to act as circumstances arise, in order that calamities may be averted, and benefits secured, personal, relative, and public.—Contending parties would often be reconciled, if they properly understood each other; hence the benefit of a prudent and impartial mediation: and the just punishment of one atrocious criminal is frequently mercy to great numbers.—Thus the sinner persists in his rebellion, till, through the Savior's mediation, he perceives that his offended Lord does not seek his destruction, but that of his sins: then he becomes willing that they should be crucified, especially the strongest and most domineering of them; and, receiving pardon and grace from God, he becomes peaceable, faithful, and useful in Israel. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1—3. The history of Saul gives no account of the transaction, which was declared to be the cause of this calamity: but it seems Saul did not attempt to extirpate the Amalekites, Philistines, and other hostile nations, whom God commanded him to destroy! These were able and determined to resist, and could not be subdued without apparent danger and difficulty; while the inoffensive Gibeonites might be oppressed with ease, and apparent safety.—It does not appear, that many of them dwelt at Nob; and neither they, nor the Levites are mentioned in the transaction recorded 1 Sam. 22:9—19. Nor could it have been said, had the slaughter been made by Doeg on that occasion, that 'Saul sought to slay them in his zeal for the children of Israel and Judah.' It seems that Saul's relations also were disposed to cruelty, and concurred in this bloodshed; and that many Israelites had willingly assisted in the persecution. SCOTT.

(2.) Amorites.] 'The Gibeonites were Hivites, not Amorites, see Josh. 6:19. But Amorites is a name often given to the Canaanites in general, Gen. 15:16. Amos 11:9, &c.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

you? and [e] wherewith shall I make the atonement, that ye may [f]bless the inheritance of the LORD?

4 And the Gibeonites said unto him, * We will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house; neither for us shalt thou kill any man in Israel. And he said, What ye shall say, that will I do for you.

5 And they answered the king, [k] The man that consumed us, and that † devised against us, that we should be destroyed from remaining in any of the coasts of Israel,

6 Let seven men of his sons be delivered unto us, and we will [l]hang them up unto the LORD [m] in Gibeah of Saul, ‡whom the LORD did choose. And the king said, I will give them.

7 But the king spared [n] Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, the son of Saul, [o] because of the LORD'S oath that was between them, between David and Jonathan the son of Saul.

8 But the king took the two sons of [p] Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, whom she bare unto Saul, Armoni and Mephibosheth: and the five sons of § Michal the daughter of Saul, whom she ‖ brought up for Adriel the son of Barzillai the Meholathite:

9 And he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill [q] before the LORD: and they fell all seven together, and were put to death in the days of harvest, in the first days, [r] in the beginning of barley-harvest.

10 And [s] Rizpah the daughter of Aiah [t] took sackcloth, and spread it for her upon the rock, [u] from the beginning of harvest [x] until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither [y] the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night.

11 And it was [z] told David what Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, the concubine of Saul, had done.

12 And David went and took [a] the bones of Saul, and the bones of Jonathan his son from the men of Jabesh-gilead, which had stolen them from the street of [b] Beth-shan, where the Philistines had hanged them, when the Philistines had slain Saul [c] in Gilboa.

13 And he brought up from thence the bones of Saul and the bones of Jonathan his son; and they gathered the bones of them that were hanged.

14 And the bones of Saul and Jonathan his son [d] buried they in the country of Benjamin in [e] Zelah, in the sepulchre of Kish his father: and they performed all that the king commanded. And after that [f] God was entreated for the land.

to Israel, whom they saw plagued for the injury done to them. 'We will hang them up unto the Lord, (v. 6.) to satisfy his justice, not to gratify any revenge of our own; for the good of the public, not for our own reputation.'

(5.) The nomination of the persons they left to David; who secures Mephibosheth for Jonathan's sake; avenging the breach of one oath, he would not himself break another; (v. 7.) but he delivered up two of Saul's sons by a concubine, and five of his grandsons, whom Merab bore to Adriel, (1 Sam. 18: 19.) but brought up by his daughter Michal, v. 8. Now Saul's treachery was punished, in giving Merab to Adriel, when he had promised her to David, with a design to provoke him. 'It is dangerous,' says Bp. Hall, on this, 'to offer injury to any of God's faithful ones; if their meekness have easily remitted it, their God will not pass it over without a severe retribution, though it may be long first.'

(6.) The place, time, and manner, of their execution, all added to the solemnity of their being sacrificed to divine justice. [1.] They were hung up as anathemas, under a peculiar mark of God's displeasure, Deut. 21: 23. Gal. 3: 13. [2.] They were hung up in Gibeah of Saul, (v. 6.) to show that it was for his sin they died. The blood of the priests, and their families, doubtless, now came in remembrance before God, and inquisition was made for it, Ps. 9: 12. Yet the blood of the Gibeonites only is mentioned; because that was shed, in violation of a sacred oath. The despising of the oath, and breaking of the covenant, will be recompensed on the head of those who thus profane God's sacred name, Ezek. 17: 18, 19. And thus God would show, that with Him rich and poor meet together. [3.] They were put to death in the days of harvest, (v. 9, 10.) to show they were thus sacrificed to turn away that wrath of God, which had withheld from them their harvest mercies for some years past, and to obtain his favor in the present harvest. There is no way of appeasing God's anger, but by mortifying and crucifying our lusts and corruptions. In vain do we expect mercy from God, unless we do justice on our sins. Those executions must not be complained of as cruel, which are become necessary to the public welfare. Better seven of Saul's bloody house be hanged, than all Israel famished.

V. 10—14. Here we have, I. Saul's sons not only hanged, but hanged till the judgment ceased, by the sending of rain on the land. They died as sacrifices, not consumed all at once by fire, but gradually by the air. They died as anathemas, as execrable, because iniquity was laid upon them But how shall we reconcile this with the law which expressly obliged to bury those that were hanged, the same day? Deut. 21: 23. It was an extraordinary case, which did not fall within that law: nay, the very reason for that law is a reason for this exception. He that is thus left hanged, is accursed, therefore ordinary malefactors must not be so abused; but therefore these must; because they were sacrificed, not to the justice of the nation, but for the crime of the nation, no less a crime than the violating of the public faith, and for the deliverance of the nation from no less a judgment than a general famine.

II. Their dead bodies watched by [the broken-hearted] Rizpah, the mother of two of them, v. 10. It was a great affliction to her, now in her old age, to see her two sons, who, we may suppose, had been a comfort to her, and were likely to be the support of her declining years, cut off in this dreadful manner. [It was a sight to move the deepest pity.] None know what sorrow they are reserved for. But she indulges her grief, as mourners are too apt to, to no good purpose. When sorrow, in such cases, is in danger of growing excessive, we should rather study how to divert and pacify it, than how to humor and gratify it. Thus she let the world know her sons died, not as stubborn and rebellious sons, whose eye had despised to obey their mother, Prov. 30: 17; but for their father's sin, therefore maternal love could not be alienated from them by their hard fate.

III. The solemn interment of their dead bodies, with the bones of Saul and Jonathan, in the burying-place of their family. 1. David was not displeased at Rizpah, but stirred up rather to honor the house of Saul, and these branches of it among the rest; thus it appeared it was not out of any personal disgust to the family that he delivered

Verses 9—14.

The execution of these persons was not considered to be within the meaning of the law, against the bodies of malefactors being left on a tree all night: for that statute meant, that those, who were put to death for breaking human laws, should not be treated as 'accursed of God.' Indeed He may command that, in a particular case, which He prohibits in general: provided it be not intrinsically unjust. He ordered the children to be put to death for the parents' crimes, though magistrates in general were forbidden to do it: and in like manner He might require this treatment of these dead bodies, though, in some respects, contrary to the general rule.—The first rain was a token of reconciliation: but after the expiation was finished, the scarcity was removed in answer to prayer; and doubtless the Gibeonites joined, in seeking 'this blessing for the inheritance of the LORD.' 15 ¶ Moreover [g] the Philistines had yet war again with Israel; and David went down, and his servants with him, and fought against the Philistines: [h] and David waxed faint.

18 And it came to pass after this, that there was again a battle with the Philistines at Gob: then [p] Sibbechai the Hushathite slew § Saph, which was of the sons of ‖ the giant.

19 And there was again a battle in Gob with the Philistines, where [q] Elhanan the son of ¶ Jaare-oregim, a Bethlehemite, slew the brother of [r] Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam.

21 And when he †† defied Israel, [t] Jonathan the son of [u] Shimeah the brother of David slew him.

22 These [x] four were born to the giant in Gath, and [y] fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.

I. David himself was engaged with one of the giants: the Philistines began the war yet again, v. 15. The enemies of God's Israel are restless in their attempts. David fought not for his own glory, (at this age he was loaded with that, and needed no more,) but for the good of his kingdom. But now he waxed faint. His body could not keep pace with his mind. Their champion was soon aware of his advantage, and, being himself strong and well armed, thought to have slain David; but God was not in his thoughts, and therefore in that very day they all perished. The enemies of God's people are often very strong, very subtle, and very sure of success, but there is no strength, nor counsel, nor confidence, against the Lord. We must own Abishai's courage and fidelity to his prince, but, much more, the good providence of God, which brought him to David's succor, v. 17. in the minute of his extremity. When Abishai gave him a cordial, it may be, to relieve his fainting spirits, or appeared as his second, he (namely, David, so I understand it) smote the Philistine, and killed him: for it is said, (v. 22.) David had himself a hand in slaying the giants. David's servants, hereupon, resolved he should never expose himself thus any more. They had easily persuaded him not to fight against Absalom, (ch. 18: 3.) but against the Philistines he would go, till, on this

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every affliction arises from sin, and should excite us to repentance: but some troubles loudly proclaim that they were especially sent to 'bring sin to remembrance.' (1 K. 17: 18.) In this case, we prolong our sufferings by neglecting self-examination, and prayer to the Lord to show us in what we have offended, if the cause be not already plain to our consciences: and, however reluctant, we must submit to this, before we can expect relief from his mercy.—While the grand outlines of the Lord's government are evidently righteous, some of his judgments are far too deep for us: but faith believes those appointments to be just, which assume a different appearance, and waits for the more complete display of the glory of God in them.—By the punishment of children for the sins of their parents, and of subjects for those of their princes, even after their death, He marks his abhorrence of destructive crimes, gives a check to enormous wickedness, and teaches us to pray for our rulers, and to deny our passions, out of love to our offspring: and He will so arrange the whole, that no individual shall in the event have cause to complain of injustice.—That our guilty land should experience successive years of plenty, calls for admiring gratitude; and we need not wonder, if our misused abundance should be punished with as great a scarcity. Yet when a scarce season occurs, how few are disposed to inquire of the Lord, concerning the sinful cause; while the ingenuity of numbers is employed in discovering the second causes, by which He is pleased to work; and the impatience and malignity of multitudes are expressed by outrages against those who are, generally without cause, charged with being the authors of the calamity!—The Lord will plead for those who cannot or will not avenge themselves; and the blood of nobles is not an adequate, though the only required and accepted atonement, to expiate the guilt of the murder of the meanest person, that the wrath of God may be averted from the land. Violated oaths and covenants will be severely punished, either in this world or the next, let the criminal be ever so highly exalted among his fellow creatures.—Our zeal, either for the public good or the supposed cause of religion, is naturally exercised in a perverse manner, and as if in contempt of God's commandments: but an apparently easy and safe exertion, which consists with our self-indulgence, and flatters our pride and lusts, is the temptation which prevails against us, unless the grace of God teach us a better way.—Little do we know what may befall our children, or what anguish they may occasion us: but if we educate them in the fear of God, and commit them to his keeping, He will either exempt us from heavy trials about them, or else support us under them. In every case, resignation to the will of God is our duty and interest; and whatever cherishes inordinate grief, is sinful, rebellious, and tormenting, however specious its appearance.—The valor and affection of friends should be acknowledged; and the strongest need the assistance of the more feeble: but the glory of every thing belongs to God. SCOTT.

Verses 15—22.

(M. R.) Ishbi-benob seems to have been Goliath's son, (as indeed do the others here mentioned,) and probably aimed to revenge his father's death. Six fingers, &c. (20) Other instances of this peculiarity are recorded by historians; and the author has been informed, by most indisputable testimony, of one such now living. [Three instances have fallen under the notice of the editor, two of which were of a father and son, and several are mentioned by Dr. A. Clarke.] SCOTT.

(18, 19.) Gob.] 'Several editions, about 40 of Kennicott's and De Rossi's mss. read Nob; but Gezer is the name, 1 Chr. 20:4. Elhanan the son of Jaare-oregim—slew—Goliath the Gittite.] Here is a most manifest corruption of the text, or gross mistake of the transcriber; David slew Goliath. In 1 Chr. 20:5. it is thus—"Elhanan, the son of Jair, slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, whose spear's staff was like a weaver's beam." This is plain, and our translators have borrowed some words from Chr. to make both texts agree. The corruption may be easily accounted for by considering, that oregim (weavers), has slipped out of one line into the other; and that Beth ha lechmi, (the Bethlehemite) is corrupted from eth lachmi; then the reading will be the same as in Chron. Kennicott.' Dr. A. CLARKE;—who, at the close of this ch. gives several reasons for suspecting, that the text of it has unusually suffered, so that the facts have been distorted: accounting for it from the distinction made by the Jewish rabbis between the different degrees of inspiration, and their less careful preservation of the historical records. But he concludes with saying, —'still the great foundation of God standeth sure, and is sufficiently attested by his own broad seal of consistency, truth, and holiness.' ED.

The introduction to David's psalm of thanksgiving, 1. He professes his confidence and joy in God, 2, 3. He states his trials and dangers, and celebrates the praises of God for surprising deliverances, 4—20. He avows his integrity, and shows the method of the Lord's dealings with men, 21—28. He anticipates the submission of the nations, and glories in the salvation of God, and his mercies to him and to his Seed for ever, 45—51.

AND [a] David spake unto the LORD [b] the words of this song, [c] in the day that the LORD had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies, and [d] out of the hand of Saul:

2 And he said, [e] The LORD is my Rock, and my Fortress, and my Deliverer;

3 The God of my rock, [f] in him will I trust; he is my [g] Shield, and [h] the Horn of my salvation, [i] my high Tower, and [k] my Refuge, [l] my Savior; [m] thou savest me from violence.

4 I [n] will call on the LORD, who is [o] worthy to be praised: [p] so shall I be saved from mine enemies.

narrow escape, it was resolved in council, and confirmed with an oath, that the light of Israel (its guide and glory, so David was) should never be put again into such hazard of being blown out.

II. The rest of the giants fell by the hand of David's servants, v. 18—20. Shimea (v. 21.) had one son named Jonadab, 2 Sam. 13: 3. I should have taken it for the same with this Jonathan; but that was noted for subtilty, this for bravery. These giants, probably, were the remains of the sons of Anak, who, though long feared, fell at last. The most powerful enemies are often reserved for the last conflict. David began his glory with the conquest of one giant, and here concludes it with the conquest of four. Death is a Christian's last enemy, and a son of Anak; but through Him that triumphed for us, we hope, even over that enemy, to be more than conquerors at last.

CHAP. XXII. This ch. is a psalm of praise; we find it afterward inserted among David's psalms, (Ps. 18.) with some little variation. We have it here, as it was at first composed for his own closet, and his own harp, but there as afterward delivered to the chief musician for the service of the church; though calculated primarily for David's case, yet it adapts itself to, [or] might aptly serve the devotion of others, in giving thanks for their deliverances: or, it was intended his people should thus join with him in his thanksgivings, because, being a public person, his deliverances were to be accounted public blessings, and called for public acknowledgments. The inspired historian, having largely related David's deliverances, in this and the foregoing ch. thought fit to record this sacred poem, as a memorial of all that had been before related. In the day that God delivered him, he sang this song. While the mercy is fresh and we are most affected with it, let the thank-offering be brought, to be kindled with the fire of that affection. Some think David penned this psalm when he was old, on a general review of the mercies of his life, and the many wonderful preservations God had blessed him with, from first to last. We should, in our praises, look as far back as we can, and not suffer time to wear out the sense of God's favors. Others think he penned it when young, on occasion of some of his first deliverances, and kept it by him for his use afterward, and that, on every new deliverance, his practice was to sing it. But the book of Psalms shows that he varied, as there was occasion, and confined not himself to one form.

V. 1—51. Let us observe, in this song of praise,

I. How David adores God, and gives Him the glory of his infinite perfections. There is none like Him, nor any to be compared with Him, v. 32. All others that are adored as deities, are counterfeits and pretenders. None are to be relied on besides. They are dead, but the Lord liveth, v. 47. They disappoint their worshippers, when they most need them. But as for God, his way is perfect, v. 31. Men begin in kindness, but end not; promise, but perform not; but God will finish his work, and his word is tried, and what we may trust.

II. How he triumphs in the interest he had in this God, and his relation to Him, which He lays down as the foundation of all the benefits he had received from Him. He is my God; as such he cries to Him, (v. 7.) and cleaves to Him; (v. 22.) and if my God, then, my Rock; (v. 2.) i. e. my Strength, and my Power, (v. 33.) the Rock under which I take shelter, and who is to me as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land; the Rock on which I build my hope, v. 3. Whatever is my strength and support, it is the God of my rock that makes it so; nay, He is the God of the rock of my salvation, (v. 47.) my saving strength is in Him and from Him. David often hides himself in a rock, (1 Sam. 24: 2.) but God was his chief Hiding-place. He is my High-tower, or Stronghold, in which I am out of the reach of evil; the Tower of salvation, (v. 51.) which can neither be scaled, nor battered, nor undermined; salvation itself saves me. Am I in distress? He is my Deliverer. Struck at? Shot at? He is my Shield. Pursued? He is my Refuge. Oppressed? He is my Savior, that rescues me out of the hand of those that seek my ruin. Nay, He is the Horn of my salvation, by which I am strongly protected, and my enemies strongly pushed. Christ is spoken of as the Horn of salvation in the house of David, Luke 1: 69. Am I burdened, and ready to sink? The Lord is my Stay, (v. 19.) by whom I am supported. Am I in the dark, benighted, at a loss? Thou art my Lamp, O Lord, to show me my way, and wilt lighten my darkness, v. 29. If we sincerely take the Lord for our God, all this, and much more, He will be to us, all we need and can desire.

III. What improvement he makes of his interest in God. If He be mine, 1. In Him will I trust; (v. 3.) i. e. I will resign myself to Him, and then depend on his power, and wisdom, and goodness, to conduct me well. 2. On Him will I call, (v. 4.) for He is worthy to be praised. What we have found in God, that is worthy to be praised, should engage us to pray to Him, and thereby we do, in effect, praise Him, and give glory to Him. 3. To Him will I give thanks, (v. 50.) and that publicly; when among the heathen, he would neither be afraid nor ashamed to own his obligations to the God of Israel.

IV. The full and large account he keeps for himself, and gives to others, of the great and kind things God had done for Him. This takes up most of the song.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. It is probable, this song of praise was composed early in the reign of David, and soon after he was finally delivered from the persecuting rage of Saul. The variations [between this and the 18th Ps.] are immaterial; though the Jewish writers enumerate no less than 74. Few of them need be here particularly noted. (Ps. 18:1.)—The first v. of this ch. forms the title of Ps. 18. with some alterations; the most remarkable of which is, the insertion of the words, 'The servant of the LORD,' in which it seems, the Psalmist deemed himself more honored, than in being a renowned conqueror, and a very prosperous king. [Nay, one of the greatest of kings.]—In the whole of this sacred hymn, David seems immediately to celebrate providential deliverances: yet he uses language, which may fairly be accommodated to spiritual blessings. He appears also primarily to speak of the Lord's dealings with himself: yet he was led by the prophetic Spirit to utter many things, which may with great propriety be applied to the Redeemer's sufferings and victories, of whom David was an evident and remarkable type. (Ps. 2: 22:1. 40:1—5. 69:1—3. 88:1, 2.) SCOTT.

'The title may only denote the time when David composed this prophetic hymn; that, when delivered from all his other enemies, as well as from the hand of Saul, he then consecrated his leisure, by writing the sublime prophecy concerning MESSIAH, his Son; whom he represents here as speaking, just as in Ps. 22:40. and other places,) and as describing, 1. His triumph over death and hell. 2. The manifestation of Omnipotence in his favor; earth and heaven trembling at God's awful presence. 3. The speaker's innocence, thus divinely attested. 4. The vengeance He was to take on his own people, the Jews, in the destruction of Jerusalem; and, 5. The adoption of the heathen, over whom He was to be Head and Ruler.' KENNICOTT.

The eighteenth psalm abruptly begins, 'I will love Thee, O LORD, my Strength;' words added, perhaps, when it was made public, as an expression of David's exulting gratitude, in order to kindle the devotions of the people. (Ps. 18:1.)—The accumulation of metaphors here used, as descriptive of David's expectations from God, which had been fully answered, denotes, that those energetic figures of speech, which commonly exceed the bounds of exact truth, are too feeble to express what God is to his believing people, and what He does for them. (2 Cor. 4:13—18.) Several expressions, as 'The God of my rock,' and 'the Horn of my salvation,' seem to refer to the person of the Redeemer, 'God manifested in the flesh,' become the Salvation of his people, and in human nature displaying divine power and authority in the redemption of believers, and the destruction of their enemies. (Ps. 27:1—3. Is. 12:2. 45:15—17. Matt. 1:20, 21. Luke 2:25—32. Tit. 2:13. 3:4—7.) SCOTT.

Verses 5, 6.

These verses contain a figurative and poetical description of the violence of David's enemies, and the imminent danger to which he was exposed. In this he was a type of Christ our King, when agonizing in the garden; when He endured the severest tortures, the pangs of death, the temptations of Satan, yea, the wrath of God against our sins; and was at the same time surrounded by the insulting scribes, priests, and people. (Ps. 18:4, 5. 40:1—5.) IN.

1. He magnifies the great salvations God had wrought for him, v. 3, 4, 18, 36. God sometimes brings his people into very great difficulties and dangers, that He may have the honor of saving them, and they the comfort of being saved by Him. To magnify the salvation, he observes, (1.) That the danger was very great and threatening, out of which he was delivered, v. 40, 49. This is expressed figuratively, v. 5, 6. (2.) That his deliverance was in answer to prayer, v. 7. He has here left us a good example, when in distress, to cry unto God with importunity, as children, in a fright, cry to their parents; and great encouragement to do so, in that he found God ready to answer. (3.) That God appeared in a singular and extraordinary manner for him, and against his enemies: the expressions are borrowed from the descent of the Divine Majesty on Sinai, v. 8, 9, &c. We do not find that in any of David's battles, God fought for him, either with thunder, as in Samuel's time, or with hail, as in Joshua's, or with the stars in their courses, as in Deborah's: but those lofty metaphors are used, 1. To set forth the glory of God, which was manifested in his deliverance. His wisdom and power, his goodness and faithfulness, his justice and holiness, and his sovereign dominion over all the creatures and all the counsels of men, which appeared in favor of David, were as clear and bright a discovery of God's glory to an eye of faith, as those would have been to an eye of sense. 2. To set forth God's displeasure against his enemies, v. 9, 13, 15. Who knows the power and terror of his wrath? 3. To set forth the vast confusion his enemies were put into, and their consternation, v. 8, 16. as if the earth had trembled, and the foundations of the world had been discovered. 4. To show how ready God was to help him, v. 11. Yet, as a God hiding

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20. When we have received mercies from God, we ought, without delay, to render him our tribute of praise and gratitude.—They who know the Lord in his glorious perfections, and the various relations in which He stands to his rational creatures, and especially as 'a God of salvation;' and who thus learn to fear, trust, love and serve Him, choosing Him as their Portion, and waiting for his mercy unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ, and according to the covenant which He mediated, may expect from Him every conceivable blessing. They are assailed by powerful enemies, and exposed to manifold troubles and dangers, from without; they are often disquieted by distressing fears and terrors of conscience, from within; while Satan pours in his horrible suggestions to aggravate their distress, and to urge them to despair. But in their extreme distress they cry unto the Lord with the greatest earnestness, and He supports them, and appears for their relief: so that all their sorrows and fears shall terminate in the more conspicuous display of the glory of God's perfections, and in the evidence of his special love to them: and however painful their feelings are at present, the retrospect shall hereafter be delightful.—The judgments of God are no less terrible now on the enemies of his people, than they were, when the earth swallowed them up, the depths of the sea overwhelmed them, or the fire of the Lord consumed them: though they are less noticed, because more spiritual, and chiefly executed in the eternal world. For still the whole creation fights against his enemies, yea, his own almighty arm is lifted up to destroy them, as well as to deliver those who trust in Him. SCOTT.

Verses 7—16.

When every other hope failed, the Psalmist simply and earnestly sought help from God; whose manifested presence, in the sanctuary above the mercy-seat, represented his tabernacling in human nature, as 'God our Savior;' and our access to Him on a throne of grace; (Ex. 25:10—21.) as well as his exalted display of his glorious presence in his holy temple in heaven.—His 'riding upon a cherub,' and 'his flying on the wings of the wind,' denote the ministration of angels, and the speed with which He effected the deliverance of his servant. (Gen. 3:22—24. Ps. 104:4. Ez. 1:4—25. 10:1—22. 11:22—25.) 'The coals of fire kindled' at his presence, may indicate, that the wrath of God arms all creatures against his enemies, or that it will consume them as fuel is consumed by the fire.—Here David was eminently the type of Christ; and the figurative language, used by him, was in many respects exactly accomplished in the preternatural convulsions attending our Lord's death and resurrection. (Ps. 18:6—15. Matt. 27:51—53. 28:1—8.) SCOTT.

(11.) 'In the original of this sublime passage, sense and sound are astonishingly well connected. "Nayirkav al keruv vaiyaoph; vaiyera al canphey ruach." The clap of the wing, the agitation and rush through the air, are expressed here in a very extraordinary manner.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 17, 18

Goliath and Saul, and other enemies were perhaps intended by the Psalmist: but the victory of Christ over 'death and him that has the power of death,' was prefigured. SCOTT.

Verse 19.

When David had framed a plan for secreting or securing himself, 'in the day of his calamity,' his enemies employed treachery and malice to prevent his success. Thus the men of Keilah were ready to deliver him to Saul, and the Ziphites repeatedly informed of him: (1 Sam. 23:9—13, 19—28. 26:1, 2.) therefore, notwithstanding his own prudence and activity, he must have been cut off, if the Lord Himself had not protected him, by his own immediate and extraordinary interposition. SCOTT.

Verse 20.

David had been straitened in dens and caves, as in a prison, and was afraid to go abroad in the open air: but now, through the divine goodness, he might walk at liberty, according to his own inclination. The words may also refer to the extent of his dominions, and the greatness of his prosperity, compared with his former difficulties. (Ps. 31:7, 8. 118:5. 142: title. 6, 7.) All this the Lord had done for him, 'because He delighted in him,' as the object of his special love, and a partaker of his sanctifying grace; and as, in the general tenor of his conduct, 'a man after his own heart.' (Note, Ps. 22:7, 8.) ID.

Verses 21—28.

This profession did not relate to David's 'justification in the sight of God;' nor was it intended as a vindication of every part of his conduct, as not needing forgiveness. (Ps. 130:3, 4. 143:2.) But it was the same consciousness of general integrity, which every true believer possesses, and may on some occasions avow, as an answer to un-the ways of the LORD, and [z] have not wickedly departed from my God.

23 For [a] all his [b] judgments were before me: and as for his statutes, [c] I did not depart from them.

24 I was also [d] upright * before him, and have [e] kept myself from mine iniquity.

25 Therefore the LORD hath [f] recompensed me according to my righteousness; according to my cleanness † in his eye-sight.

26 With [g] the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful, and with the upright man thou wilt show thyself upright.

27 With [h] the pure thou wilt show thyself pure; and with [i] the froward thou wilt ‡ show thyself unsavory.

28 And [k] the afflicted people thou wilt save: [l] but thine eyes are upon the haughty, that thou mayest bring them down.

29 For thou art my § Lamp, O LORD: and the LORD will [m] lighten my darkness.

37 Thou hast [c] enlarged my steps under me; so that [d] my ‖‖ feet did not slip.

38 I have [e] pursued mine enemies, and destroyed them; and turned not again until I had consumed them.

39 And I have [f] consumed them, and wounded them, that they could not arise: yea, they are fallen under my feet.

40 For thou hast [g] girded me with strength to battle: [h] them that rose up against me hast thou ¶¶ subdued under me.

41 Thou hast also given me the [i] necks of mine enemies, that [k] I might destroy them that hate me.

Himself, (Isa. 45: 15.) He made darkness his pavilion, (v. 12.) for the amazement of his enemies, and the protection of his own people. (4.) That God manifested his particular favor and kindness to him in these deliverances, v. 20. The deliverance came not from common providence, but covenant-love; he was treated as a favorite; so he perceived by the communications of divine grace and comfort to his soul, with these deliverances, and the communion he had with God in them. Herein he was a type of Christ, whom God upheld, because He delighted in Him, Isa. 42: 1, 2.

God, having called him to fight his battles, qualified him for the service, made him very ingenious, v. 35. vigorous and valiant, v. 40. He gives God the glory of all his courage and ability for service. He was very expeditious too, v. 34. which is of great advantage, both in charging and retreating. (3.) merited reproach, consistently with the deepest humility, and the most entire dependence on the mercy and grace of God through Jesus Christ. (2 Cor. 1:12—14. 1 Thes. 2:9—12. 1 John 3:18—24.) And the gracious recompense, of which David spoke, may be generally expected by those, who act conscientiously in the sight of God, from right motives. This accords to his method of dealing with mankind, and especially with his professed worshippers. If He sees them humble, sincere, teachable, watchful, loving, pure, and obedient in their general conduct; He will be merciful and kind to them, and will fulfil his promises, and communicate his holy consolations, to them: but if He sees them dissembling or perverse, 'He will wrestle with them.' He will likewise save those who are poor in spirit, and suffer persecution for his sake; but with his wrath He will frown upon proud oppressors to bring them down. (M. R. k, l.)—It should be remembered, that David, in these things, was a type of Christ, to whom many of the expressions here used are applicable in the fullest sense, and to Him alone. SCOTT.

Verses 29, 30.

Many of the verbs, in different parts of the Psalm, are future in the original: probably, as expressing David's previous believing expectations, to which the subsequent events corresponded; and thus turned the language of hope into that of thanksgiving. ID.

Verses 34, 35.

As hinds [or other animals of the goat kind] climb the craggy rocks, and stand firm on the slippery summit of the precipice [in consequence of that peculiar structure of their hoofs, concave on the bottom with a hard, horny rim]; so David had been upheld in the most dangerous and slippery paths, and advanced to his present exalted station, by the providence and grace of God: (Deut. 33:24, 25. Hab. 3:17—19.) and his extraordinary skill and strength in war must be ascribed to the same cause.—The word rendered steel, generally signifies copper, or brass, of which the ancients frequently made arms: though bows, requiring elasticity, could not well be made of it. ID.

(35.) Bow of steel.] Rather of copper, brass, or bronze, the Hebrew being nechosheth. A cut is given of a bow of bronze, [so Champollion,] from the monuments of Egypt. It was used also as a kind of noose to entangle the bow or arms of an antagonist, and draw him within reach of a spear or sword. ED.

Verse 36.

Gentleness, &c] The rebukes, corrections, and instructions, which the Lord intermixed with his merciful forgiveness, encouragements, and deliverances, like the gentle tuition of a kind parent, tended to prepare David for prosperity and authority, and to advance him to them. SCOTT.

Verses 37—42.

The meaning of these vs. as applied to David, wants no other explanation than the preceding history, implying his believing anticipations, fully verified by the event. But they are peculiarly descriptive of the Redeemer's conflicts and victories, and especially of the inevitable destruction which came upon the Jews, and the disgraceful dispersion of the degraded remnant of that nation, for crucifying the Lord of glory, and rejecting the Gospel. They cried and still cry to the Lord to save them; but refusing to obey his beloved Son, He vouchsafes them no answer.—Thus David's enemies, in their extreme distress, are represented as crying to the Lord for deliverance from impending ruin; but, as they did it not in repentance, faith, and integrity, it was in vain. Thus Saul inquired of the Lord, and He answered him not. (1 Sam. 28:6. 1 Chr. 10:13, 14.) ID.

nity. God's gentleness, his grace, and tender mercy, made him great, v. 36. gave him great wealth, and great authority; many remote nations should serve him, v. 44.

V. The comfortable reflections he makes on his own integrity, which God, by those wonderful deliverances, had graciously owned, and witnessed to, v. 21—25. He means especially with reference to Saul and Ish-bosheth, Absalom and Sheba, and those who either opposed his coming to the crown, or endeavored to dethrone him; he had the testimony of his conscience, that he was not ambitious, aspiring, false and bloody, as they called him; that he had never taken any indirect, unlawful courses to secure or raise himself, but in his whole conduct had kept in the way of his duty: and that in the whole course of his conversation he had, for the main, made religion his business, so that he could take God's favors to him, as the rewards of his righteousness, not of debt, but of grace; God had recompensed him, though not for his righteousness, as if that had merited any thing at the hand of God, yet according to his righteousness, which He was well-pleased with, and had an eye to.

His conscience witnessed for him, that he had made the Word of God his rule, and had kept to it, v. 23. 1. Wherever he was, God's judgments were before him as his guide; whithersoever he went, he took his religion with him; and though forced to fly his country, and sent, as it were, to serve other gods, yet, as for God's statutes, he did not depart from them, but kept the way of the Lord, and walked in it. 2. He could not but say he had not deserted God, or forsaken his way. Sins of infirmity he could not acquit himself from, but the grace of God had kept him from presumptuous sins. By this it appeared he was upright before God, or to God, in his sight, and with an eye to Him—that he kept himself from his own iniquity: not only from that particular sin of killing Saul, when it was in the power of his hand to do it, but, in general, he was afraid of sin, and watchful against it, and made conscience of what he said and did. The matter of Uriah is an exception, (1. K. 15: 5.) like that in Hezekiah's character, 2 Chr. 32: 31. David reflected with more comfort on his victories over his own iniquity, than on his conquest of Goliath, and all the hosts of uncircumcised Philistines; and the witness of his own heart to his uprightness was sweeter, though more silent music, than theirs that sang, David has slain his ten thousands. If a great man be a good man, his goodness will be much more his satisfaction than his greatness. Let favor be shown to the upright, and his uprightness will sweeten, and double it.

VI. His comfortable prospects of God's further favor; as he looks back, so he looks forward, with pleasure, and assures himself of the kindness God had in store for all the saints, for himself and his Seed.

1. For all good people, v. 26—28. As God had dealt with him according to his uprightness, so He will with all others. He takes occasion here to lay down the established rules of God's proceedings with men: (1.) That He will do good to the upright in heart. As we are found toward God, He will be found toward us. God's mercy and grace will be the joy of those that are merciful and gracious: even the merciful need mercy, and they shall obtain it. God's uprightness, justice and faithfulness, will be the joy of those that are upright, just, and faithful toward God and man. God's purity and holiness will be the joy of the pure and holy, who therefore give thanks at the remembrance of it. And if any of these good people be afflicted people, He will save them, either out of their afflictions, or by and after them. On the other hand, (2.) That those who turn aside to crooked ways, He will lead forth with the workers of iniquity, as he says in another psalm, With the froward He will wrestle; and Wo unto him that strives with his Maker! He will walk contrary to those that walk contrary to Him, and be displeased with those that are displeased with Him. As for the haughty, his eyes are upon them, marking them out, as it were, to be brought down: He resists the proud.

2. For himself. He foresees his conquests and kingdom should be yet further enlarged, v. 45, 46. Thus the Son of David goes on, conquering and to conquer, Rev. 6: 2. His Gospel, which has been victorious, shall be so more and more.

3. For his seed. He showeth mercy to his Messiah, (v. 51.) not only to David himself, but to that Seed of his for evermore. David was himself anointed of God, not an usurper, but duly called to the government, and qualified for it, therefore he doubted not but God would show mercy to him: that mercy he had promised not to take from him, nor from his posterity; (ch. 7: 15, 16.) on that

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 21—51. Under reproaches and persecutions, the testimony of conscience, to our integrity and sincerity in our religious profession, 'not of fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God,' will prove a singular support: and it perfectly consists with the deepest humility, and the most simple dependence on the Savior. Nor can we without it expect the witness of the comforting Spirit of God. We should therefore 'exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man:' and, earnestly seeking supporting and sanctifying grace, we should steadily persevere in the path of duty, rejecting every temptation to seek relief by forsaking it.—In the darkest seasons the Lord will guide and comfort those who trust in and follow Him: and of the very many millions, who have tried his word, none ever complained that He was unfaithful; but all have been so assisted, that they have at length wondered at what the Lord had enabled them to do, as well as what He had done for them. Without Him all other helpers are vain; and with Him they are needless, except as He pleases to work by them, as his instruments of good to us. All our talents and abilities are from God, and all our improvement of them: whatever services we have performed, or however consistent our walk has been, the will and the power have been from Him: 'He is our Strength, who maketh our way perfect.' Ability and success in our spiritual warfare, liberty from sin and Satan, enlargement of heart in the service of our God, and preservation in the slippery paths of this ensnaring world, are causes for thankfulness, and not for glorying in ourselves.—But we may here likewise meditate on the Redeemer's sufferings, and the glory which was to follow, and which has followed, and shall still far more be displayed. (45) Or, yield feigned obedience. Heb. lie (M) May not this expression, which occurs in many Psalms prophetical of the Messiah's kingdom, be considered as a prediction of that influx of hypocrites into the church, especially in and after the days of Constantine, in consequence of the astonishing external displays of the Redeemer's power, in the first ages? From this time formal Christians, who lie in their profession, have been exceedingly multiplied. promise he depends, with an eye to Christ, who alone is his Seed for evermore, whose throne and kingdom still continue, and will, to the end, whereas the seed and lineage of David are long since extinct. See Ps. 89: 28, 29. Thus all his joys and all his hopes terminate, as ours should, in the great Redeemer.

CHAP. XXIII. The historian is now drawing toward a conclusion of David's reign, and therefore gives us an account here of some of his last words, which he spake by inspiration, and which seem to have reference to his Seed that was to be for evermore, spoken of in the close of the foregoing ch.

V. 1—7. We have here the last will and testament of king David, or a codicil annexed to it, after he had settled the crown upon Solomon, and his treasures. The last words of great and good men are thought worthy to be, in a special manner, remarked and remembered; David would have [his own] noticed and added, either to his Psalms, (as they are here to that in the foregoing chapter,) or to the chronicles of his reign. These words, especially, v. 5. though recorded before, we may suppose he often repeated for his own consolation, even to his last breath, and therefore they are called his last words. When we find death approaching, we should endeavor both to honor God, and to edify those about us, with our last words. Let those that have had long experience of God's goodness, and the pleasantness of wisdom, when they come to finish their course, leave a record of that experience, and bear their testimony to the truth of the promise. We have on record the last words of Jacob and Moses, and here of David, designed, as those, for a legacy to them that were left behind. We are here told,

I. Whose last will and testament this is; related, either, as is usual, by the testator himself, or, rather, by the historian, v. 1. He is described, 1. By the meanness of his original: the son of Jesse. It is good for those who are advanced to be corner-stones, and top-stones, to be reminded, and often to remind themselves, of the rock out of which they were hewn. 2. By the height of his elevation: he was raised up on high, as a prince, to sit higher than his neighbors, and as a prophet, to see further; to be serviceable to the people of God in their civil interests, and in their religious exercises. Observe, Was David a prince anointed? He was so for Jacob. Was he the sweet psalmist? He was so for Israel. Note, The dispensation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal, therefore, as every man has received the gift, so let him minister the same.

II. What the purport of it is. It is an account of his communion with God.

Pious persons take a pleasure in calling to mind what they have heard from God, in recollecting his word, and revolving it in their minds. Thus what God spake once, David heard twice, yea often. Observe, David here avows his divine inspiration, that in his Psalms, and in this composition here, the Spirit of God spake by him. He, and other holy men, spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. This puts an honor on the book of Psalms, and recommends them to our use in our devotions, that they are words which the Holy Ghost teaches.

A distinction seems to be made between what the Spirit of God spake by David, which includes all his Psalms, and what the Rock of Israel spake to David, which concerned himself and his family. Let ministers observe, that those by whom God speaks to others, are concerned to hear and heed what He speaks to themselves. They whose office it is to teach others their duty, must be sure to learn and do their own.

Now what is here said, (v. 3, 4.) may be considered,

1. With application to David and his royal family. And so here is, (1.) The duty of magistrates. Let rulers remember they rule over men; not beasts whom they may enslave and abuse at pleasure, but reasonable creatures of the same rank with themselves; men that have their follies and infirmities, and therefore must be borne with: over men, but under God, and for Him. They must be just, both to those over whom they rule, and between them; see Deut. 1: 16, 17. It is not enough that they do no wrong, they must not suffer wrong to be done. They must rule in the fear of God; that is, be possessed themselves with a fear of God, which will restrain from all acts of injustice and oppression; so Nehemiah, ch. 5: 15. so Josepn, Gen. 42: 18. and also endeavor to promote the fear of God, i. e. the practice of religion, among those over whom they rule. The magistrate is to be the keeper of both tables, and to protect botn godliness and honesty. (2.) Prosperity promised them, if they do this duty, v. 4. Light is sweet and pleasant, and a great blessing; such are good princes that rule in the fear of God. The light of the morning is most welcome after the darkness of the night; such is the growing lustre of a good government; as David's after Saul's; (Ps. 75: 3.) It is likewise compared to the tender grass, which the earth produces for the service of man; it brings with it a harvest of blessings. See Ps. 72: 6, 16. which were also some of the last words of David, and seem to refer to these here.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1, 2. Many things, after this, are recorded concerning the words and actions of David; so that it is not agreed in what sense these were his 'last words.' Some suppose them to have been the last words he spoke by inspiration, and, as it were, an appendix to the Psalms he composed: but perhaps he repeated them in his dying moments, as the expression of his faith and hope, and the source of his consolation. These vs. explained of David, taught the duties incumbent on him, as king of Israel; how he ought to instruct his son and successor Solomon; and the general character of good and pious magistrates, who are blessings to the people. (M. R.)—Many expositors, however, interpret the words almost exclusively of Christ; the anointed King of Israel, and the Ruler over the sons of Adam in general. He is indeed just and righteous: He is the Righteousness and Sanctification of his subjects; and both requires and teaches, inclines and enables, them to fear God, and work righteousness. His light, and grace, and consolations, render them fruitful and happy; and the blessings of his kingdom are inexpressible, and shall be eternal. Verses 4, 5.

'As lovely as the morning when the sun ariseth; a morning not gloomy, threatening tempests and hurricanes, but cloudless and bright; as flourishing as grass from the earth after rain [note, 1 K. 18:4.]; So shall my house or family abide, splendid in rank and in honors; flourishing until He come, who is to be the just Ruler over mankind; and when every other branch is cut off, flourishing in Him for ever. Such I take to be the import of this passage.' ID.

(5.) This verse is supposed to be peculiarly difficult, and is variously interpreted, generally as relating to the covenant made with David concerning the kingdom.—But, he seems here to have turned his reflections from the kingdom of his posterity, and especially that of the Messiah, to his own personal concerns, and those of his family and immediate descendants.—By 'the everlasting covenant' David no doubt principally intended the covenant of mercy and peace, which the Lord had made with him, as one who believed in the promised Savior, and had yielded up himself to be his redeemed servant, and had been made partaker of his sanctifying grace, as the seal and pledge of it. (Is. 55:1—3. Jer. 32:39—41. Ez. 37:25, 26. Heb. 13:20, 21.) This covenant was 'from everlasting' in the purposes of God, and shall be 'to everlasting' in the blessed effects of it. From age to age sinners, when they accede to it by true faith, are admitted to share its benefits, which believers shall for ever enjoy; and God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, for ever be glorified through it, in their salvation. It is made with the Surety, in behalf of those for whom He engaged; all the blessings of it were obtained and secured by his atoning blood, and are freely bestowed on all who believe in his name; and it secures to them pardon, righteousness, grace, and 'eternal life, as the gift of God through Jesus Christ.' It is 'ordered in all things:' for in the Person, undertaking, and mediation of the Savior, effectual provision is made for the manifestation of the holiness, the satisfaction of the justice, and the honor of the law of God, and the discovery of the evil and desert of sin. While his mercy abounds in the forgiveness and salvation of the chief of sinners; there is an infinite fulness of grace, and of all blessings, treasured up in Christ, for the supply of those who seek for this salvation; a way opened to the mercy-seat of God, in which they may come in humble confidence; ordinances appointed, through which these blessings are communicated; invitations to draw near, and 'exceedingly great and precious promises' to plead with God. All those things, which in one respect are commanded, in another are promised; and while we pray for the performance of the promise, we are enabled to obey the command, to repent, to forsake sin, to turn unto God, and to walk in newness of life. This covenant is also 'sure,' or preserved. It is preserved by the continual intercession of Christ, and the promises, and securities grounded on it. (Luke 22:31—34. Rom. 5:7—10. 8:32—34. Col. 3:1—4. 1 Pet. 1. 3—5. 2 Pet. 1:10, 11. Jude 1, 2.)—Provision is made for the recovery of those, who have walked inconsistently with it in the most disgrace-

2. With application to Christ, and then it must all be taken as a prophecy, and the original will bearit. He is a Ruler among men, or over men, just, and ruling in the fear of God. He orders the affairs of religion, and divine worship, according to his Father's will; and He shall be as the light of the morning, &c. for He is the Light of the world, and as the tender grass, for He is the Branch of the Lord, and the Fruit of the earth, Isa. 4: 2. Compare this with those promises of Christ, which speak of his reigning in righteousness, and being of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, Isa. 11: 1—5.—32: 1, 2. Ps. 72: 2. God, by the Spirit, gave David the foresight of this, to comfort him under the many calamities of his family, and the melancholy prospects he had of the degeneracy of his seed. Observe,

III. The comfortable use he made of what God spake to him, and his devout meditations on it, by way of reply, v. 5. It is not unlike his meditation, on occasion of such a message, 2 Sam. 7: 18, &c.

1. Trouble supposed. David's family was not as described, (v. 3, 4.) and as he could wish; not so good, not so happy; he foresaw it would not be so when he was gone; neither so pious nor so prosperous as one might have expected the offspring of such a father to be. Not so with God. Note, We and ours are that really, which we are with God. This David's heart was upon concerning his children, that they might be right with God; the children of godly parents are often neither so holy nor so happy as might be expected: corruption, not grace, runs in the blood; the race is not to the swift, but God gives the Spirit as a free Agent. Not made to grow in number, in power; God makes families to grow, or not to grow, Ps. 107: 41. Good men have often the melancholy prospect of a declining family. David's house was typical of the church of Christ, Heb. 3: 3. Suppose this be not so with God as we could wish, but diminished, distressed, disgraced, and weakened by errors and corruptions, yea, almost extinct, yet God has made a covenant with the church's Head, the Son of David, that He will preserve to Him a seed, that the gates of hell shall never prevail against his house. This our Savior comforted Himself with, in his sufferings, that the covenant with Him stood firm, Isa. 53: 10—12.

2. Comfort insured. Whatever trouble a child of God may have in prospect, still he has one comfort or other to balance it with, (2 Cor. 4: 8, 9.) and none like this here. It may be understood of the covenant of royalty, (in the type,) which God made with David and his seed, touching the kingdom, Ps. 132: 11, 12. But, it must look further, to the covenant of grace, made with all believers, that God will be, in Christ, to them a God, which was signified by the covenant of royalty, and therefore the promises of the covenant are called, the sure mercies of David, Isa. 55: 3. God has made a covenant of grace with us in Jesus Christ, and we are here told, it is an everlasting covenant; from everlasting in contrivance and counsel, to everlasting in continuance and consequences. It is ordered, well-ordered in all things, admirably well, to advance the glory of God, and the honor of the Mediator, with the holiness and comfort of believers. Whatever is required in it,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. It has been observed by those who intimately converse with persons of genuine piety, that they are uniformly most sensible of the reality and importance of heavenly things, when they consider themselves as very nearly approaching to the eternal world. If discouraged respecting their own interest in the invisible blessings, their assured belief excites the most earnest and distressing anxiety, lest they should come short of them: but when their hope abounds, they exult and triumph, though parting with all below, though oppressed with pain and sickness, and in the very agonies of death! So that many have gone from their dying beds more convinced of the truth and excellency of the Gospel by their 'last words' and behavior, than by all the arguments which have conclusively been adduced in proof of it.—When we approach this closing scene, it will be useful and pleasant to consider what we originally were, and to inquire what the Lord has done for us, in his providence, and by his grace. The more we have been conformed to the Savior, as bearing his image, and copying his example; and the more we have been treated by the world as He was; the more clearly it will appear that we belong to Him.—They who stir up and assist their brethren in the exercises of devotion, are peculiarly useful: and the sweet work of praise and thanksgiving, when conducted with solemnity, as springing from lively affections, is an anticipation of heavenly joy, a solace of earthly sorrows, a preparation for every service, most honorable to God, and calculated to give religion an attractive aspect.—The best of men, reviewing their past conduct, and comparing it impartially with the rule of duty, will see great cause to be humbled, and to mourn over their sins. Neither their hearts nor their houses will be found what they ought to be: but it will be their earnest desire, aim, and prayer, that their families may be the accepted servants of God, without which no outward prosperity will satisfy their minds: and if, through their own negligence, or occasional misconduct, they are otherwise; they will be the more earnest in supplication for them, that they may not perish with the sons of Belial.—Yet in all their troubles, true believers, being conscious that they 'have fled for refuge to the hope set before them' in the Gospel, and having experienced the power of renewing grace, may rejoice that the Lord 'hath made with them an everlasting covenant;' and may meditate with comfort on the rich provisions and firm security of it.—Such, as are in reality partakers of divine grace, will long for more holiness: and those who, in this imperfect state, are satisfied with their present attainments, have no good ground to consider themselves as true Christians. SCOTT.

ful manner: and yet not the least encouragement is given to commit sin, but the most effectual methods are used to deter men from it, and constrain them to all holy obedience. (1 John 2:1—3.) So that it is 'ordered in all things,' in such a manner, that no believer can want wisdom, grace, or strength sufficient for him, whatever his conflicts, temptations, or difficulties may be: and he shall either persevere in a uniform course of holy obedience, or be brought to deep and evident repentance of his misconduct, and shall infallibly at length inherit eternal life.—This covenant was 'all David's salvation;' for he was so well acquainted with the holy character and law of God, the evil of sin, and his own sinfulness in every thing, that he knew he could not escape condemnation, according to the covenant of works: and he perceived that all things suited to his case, and sufficient for his salvation, were engaged for by it to every believer; and that it was framed in perfect wisdom, so as to honor God, to humble and encourage the sinner, to inspire love and gratitude, to bring him to a holy and happy disposition of mind, and to prepare him for that state of complete felicity, in which all the powers of the human soul shall be eternally satisfied. It was also 'all his desire,' or delight, as the word is generally rendered: in comparison with it, all earthly objects lost their attractions; he was willing to renounce them, as far as required, for the sake of the blessings of the covenant; his comfort, while he possessed them, was derived from it, not from them; and he was willing to die and leave all else, that he might enjoy its full felicity. This he was conscious of: and yet he complained, that matters were not with his soul, any more than with his house, as he could wish; for this seems the meaning of the words, 'although He make it not to grow.' The grace of the covenant he had received, but it had not been made to increase and flourish, in that measure which he desired. Still the prevalence of sinful propensities, and the weakness of his faith, hope, and love, were his grief and burden. The Lord had not 'made them to grow.' David did not mean to impeach the wisdom, justice, and goodness of God, who had good reasons for what He withheld, as well as for what He gave; and doubtless David would have allowed that his own inattention and negligence were the criminal cause, why his grace had not more been made to grow. But the hope, that it would ere long be perfected in glory, animated and encouraged him in his dying moments.—Referring this also to the Redeemer, it may be observed, that the kingdom of David's family was not so with God in any other period, as under Him: and foreseen by faith, He, as the Surety of the everlasting covenant, was all David's Salvation and Desire; though his coming was distant, and though his cause of truth and righteousness did not prosper in Israel, nor even in the prophet's own heart, as he most earnestly desired that it might. Verses 6, 7.

As a man fenced, or completely armed, (marg.) 'with iron and the staff of a spear,' can thrust the thorns into the fire: and so Christ is able to destroy out of his kingdom all his enemies, and will 'make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath.' (Ps. 21:8—12. Nah. 1:9, 10.) As the willing subjects of David prospered, but his opposers were crushed; so shall it be with those who submit to the authority of the Redeemer, and those who reject Him. is promised; every transgression does not throw us out of it, and it puts our salvation, not in our own keeping, but in the keeping of a Mediator. It is sure; sure, because well-ordered; the general offer, the promised mercies, the particular application of it to true believers, are sure to all the seed. It is all our salvation: nothing but this will save us, and this is sufficient: on this only our salvation depends. Therefore it must be all our desire. Let me have an interest in this covenant, and the promises of it, and I have enough, I desire no more.

3. Here is the doom of the sons of Belial, v. 6, 7. thrust away as thorns, rejected, abandoned; like thorns, not to be touched with hands; therefore, like thorns, to be utterly burnt with fire, Heb. 6: 8. This is intended, either, As a direction to magistrates, to use their power to punish and suppress wickedness. Let them thrust away the sons of Belial; see Ps. 101: 8. Or, As a caution to magistrates, particularly David's sons and successors, to see that they be not themselves sons of Belial, for then, though men could not deal with them, God would. Or, As a prediction of the ruin of all the implacable enemies of Christ's kingdom: enemies without, that openly oppose it, and fight against it; enemies within, that secretly betray it; both sons of Belial, the children of the wicked one, of the serpent's seed: both as thorns, grievous and vexatious: but both to be so thrust away, as that Christ will set up his kingdom, in despite of their enmity, will go through them, (Isa. 27: 4.) and, in due time, bless his church with such peace, that there shall be no pricking brier, nor grieving thorn. And those that will not repent, to give glory to God, shall, in the judgment-day, (to which the Chaldee paraphrast refers this,) be burnt with unquenchable fire. See Luke 19: 27.

V. 8—39. The catalogue here left on record of the greatest soldiers in David's time, is intended, 1. For the honor of David, who trained them up in the arts and exercises of war, and set them an example of conduct and courage. 2. For the honor of those worthies themselves, who were instrumental to bring David to the crown, settle and protect him in the throne, and enlarge his conquests. Note, Those that in public stations venture themselves, and lay out themselves, to serve the interests of their country, are worthy of double honor, both to be respected by those of their own age, and to be remembered by posterity. 3. To excite those that come after, to a generous emulation. 4. To show how much religion contributes to inspire men with true courage. David, both by his Psalms, and by his offerings for the service of the temple, greatly promoted piety among the grandees of the kingdom; (1 Chr. 29: 6.) and when they became famous for piety, they became famous for bravery.

Now these mighty men are here divided into three ranks.

I. The first three, who had done the greatest exploits, and thereby gained the greatest reputation. Adino, (v. 8.) Eleazar, (v. 9, 10.) and Shammah, v. 11, 12. I do not remember that we read of any of these, or of their actions, any where in all the story of David, but here, and in the parallel place, 1 Chr. 11. Many great and remarkable events are passed by in the annals, which relate rather the blemishes, than the glories, of David's reign, especially after his sin in the matter of Uriah; so that we may conclude it to have been more illustrious than it has appeared to us while reading the records of it.

The exploits of this brave triumvirate are here recorded. They signalized themselves in the wars of Israel against their enemies, especially the Philistines. Note, How great soever the bravery of the instruments is, the praise of the achievement must be given to God. These fought the battles, but God wrought the victory. Let him that glories, glory in the Lord.

II. The next three were distinguished from, and dignified above, the thirty, but attained not to the first three, v. 23. All great men are not of the same size. Many a bright and benign star there is, which is not of the first magnitude. Of this second triumvirate, two only are named, Abishai and Benaiah, whom we have often met with in the story of David; and who seem to have been not inferior in serviceableness, though they were in dignity, to the first three. 1. They attended David in his troubles, when he absconded in the

Verse 8.

Under Joab, the chief captain, the persons mentioned in this chapter, were the principal officers in David's army: and as only 36 are named, Joab must be added to complete the number 37. (39) There were two triumvirates; and under them thirty officers, who commanded subdivisions of the troops. Of several of them, and of their exploits, we read nothing elsewhere: so that David's reign and actions were far more splendid, than they appear in the history.—Adino the Tachmonite, is called Jashobeam the Hachmonite. (1 Chr. 11:11.) It is supposed that he had his title from his wisdom, and that he ordinarily presided in councils of war.—It is here said he slew 800 men, in Chronicles only 300: perhaps 300 were left dead on the spot, and the rest died afterwards; or two different actions are meant, or some trivial mistake has been made. (M. R.) SCOTT.

'This v. contains three great corruptions. (1.) The proper name of Jashobeam is turned into two common words, rendered, sat in his seat. (2.) The words, he lifted up his spear, are turned into two proper names, wholly inadmissible here:—hu Adino Haetsni, he was Adino the Eznite: it being nearly as absurd to say, that Jashobeam the Hachmonite was the same with Adino the Eznite, as that David the Bethlehemite was the same as Elijah the Tishbite. (3.) 800 should be 300; as 1 Chr. 11:11.' KENNICOTT, in CLARKE.

Verses 11, 12.

In Chronicles this victory seems ascribed to Eleazar, who perhaps was the chief commander, though Shammah most distinguished himself.—The field also is said to have been 'full of barley:' perhaps part of it was sown with lentiles, and part with barley. It is probable, that, during the harvest, the Philistines invaded the land of Israel, in order to carry off or destroy the crop; and that David and his men opposed them: and the three captains, of the thirty afterwards mentioned, having come to him in the cave of Adullam, (probably when persecuted by Saul,) assisted him. (1 Sam. 22:1, 2. Ps. 142: title.) A garrison also of Philistines, at the same time, occupied the outer gate of Bethlehem, the city of David.—Some expositors think that David, by wishing for the water of the well of Bethlehem, meant to stir up his whole band to attempt dispossessing the cave of Adullam, (v. 13.) suffered with him, and therefore were afterward preferred by him. Let us be willing to venture in the cause of Christ, even when it is a suffering cause, as those who are assured that it will prevail, and that we shall not lose by it at last. Were they so forward to expose themselves, on the least hint of their prince's mind, and so ambitious to please him? And shall not we covet to approve ourselves to our Lord Jesus, by a ready compliance with every intimation of his will, given us by his word, Spirit, and providence? Some make it a public-spirited wish that David expressed, about the water of the well of Bethlehem, the well being put for the city, as the river often signifies the country it passes through. But if he meant so, those about him did not understand him; therefore it seems rather to be an instance of his weakness. Patrick speaks of some who think it was not material water David longed for, but the Messiah, who had the water of life; who, he knew, should be born at Beth-lehem, which the Philistines therefore should not be able to destroy. Did David look upon that water as very precious, which was got at the hazard of these men's blood, and shall not we much more value those benefits, for the purchasing of which our blessed Savior shed his blood? Let us not undervalue the blood of the covenant, as they do, that undervalue the blessings of the covenant.—In a time of snow, [20] he was more stiff, and the lion more fierce and ravenous, and yet he mastered him.

24 [z] Asahel the brother of Joab was one of the thirty; Elhanan the son of Dodo of Beth-lehem,

III. Inferior to the second three, but of great note, were the 31 here mentioned by name, v. 24, &c. The surnames here given them, are taken, as it should seem, from the places of their birth or habitation, as many surnames with us originally were. From all parts of the nation, the most wise and valiant were picked up to serve the king. Several of these here named, we find captains of the twelve courses which David appointed, one for each month in the year, 1 Chr. 27. They that did worthily, were preferred according to their merits. Joab is not mentioned, 1. Because he was so great, he did not need to be mentioned; the first of the first three sat chief among the captains, but Joab was over them as general. Or, 2. Because he was so bad, he did not deserve to be mentioned; for though he was confessedly a great soldier, and one that had so much religion in him as to dedicate of his spoils to the house of God, (1 Chr. 26: 28.) yet he lost as much honor

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8—39. The habit of wishing and hankering after those things which Providence withholds, though natural to us, and often given way to by godly men in an unguarded hour, is indeed a degree of rebellion against the Lord; and it shows the remaining sensuality and selfishness of the heart, and leads to many snares and evils. Under Christ's command, as 'the Captain of our salvation,' and refreshed by the waters of life which He bestows, we may venture to engage, yea defy, all our adversaries at the greatest disadvantage, and shall be able to turn their own arms upon them. Though not numbered with apostles and prophets, our names and services will be recorded in the book of life; and not a cup of cold water, given for his sake, shall be unrewarded: yea, the willing mind to suffer for Him, shall be accepted, as if we had actually laid down our lives in his cause. But, as He has shed his blood for sinners, let all beware of neglecting so great salvation: for the sons of Belial, especially those who reject or pervert his truth, and persecute his people, will be thrust away, as thorns, into the everlasting fire of hell. garrison, and not that his officers alone should attack them. It is more probable, however, that being very thirsty in hot weather, he eagerly desired, and inconsiderately wished, to quench his thirst at that well, the water being remarkably good: and that these brave men, to express their peculiar attachment to him, broke, sword in hand, through the Philistines, and returned to him with some of the water. David however was, on recollection, ashamed of his inordinate desire and rash wish; and being unwilling to encourage such desperate attempts, he refused to drink of it, but poured it out as a drink-offering unto the Lord. For, as it had been procured at the hazard of the lives of these brave officers, he would no more drink of it, than he would drink their blood: 'Far be it from me,' said he, or 'My God forbid it me.' (Ps. 72:14. 116:15.)—'Beth-lehem' signifies the house of bread; and the place was likewise noted for excellent water. (M. R.) We are not told on what occasions these exploits were performed: but they were done in faith, by the Lord's extraordinary assistance, and for the public good. CHAP XXIV.

David requires Joab to number the people, who very reluctantly complies, 1—8. Joab delivers in the number to the king, 9. He repents; and being warned by Gad the prophet, and obliged to choose one plague; out of three proposed to him, he fixes on three days' pestilence, 10—14. After seventy thousand had died in Israel, the angel is stayed from destroying Jerusalem, in answer to David's prayer, 15—17. David, directed by God, purchases Araunah's threshing-floor, builds an altar, and sacrifices; and the plague is stayed, 18—25.

3 And Joab said unto the king, [g] Now the LORD thy God add unto the people, how many soever they be, an hundred fold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it: but why doth my lord the king delight in this thing?

4 Notwithstanding, [h] the king's word prevailed against Joab, and against the captains of the host. And Joab and the captains of the host [i] went out from the presence of the king to number the people of Israel.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—9. Here we have, I. David's orders to Joab to number the people of Israel and Judah, v. 1, 2. Two things here seem strange.

1. The sinfulness of this. What harm was there in it? Did not Moses twice number the people, without any crime? Should not the shepherd know the number of his sheep? Does not the Son of David know all his own by name? Might not he make good use of this calculation? What evil has he done, if he do this? Answer. It is certain it was a sin, and a great sin; but where the evil of it lay is not so certain. Some think the fault was, he numbered those under 20 years, if they were but of stature and strength able to bear arms; and that was the reason why this account was not enrolled, because it was illegal, 1 Chr. 27: 23, 24. Others, that he did not require the half-shekel, Ex. 30: 12. Others think that he did it with a design to impose a tribute on them for himself, by way of poll; but nothing of this appears, nor was David ever a raiser of taxes. [Others think he designed ambitious and unbidden conquests, the great sin of powerful princes and nations; and his people, proud of prosperity, wished also thus to acquire 'glory', at the expense of every blessing to themselves and others; the usual price of wars, then as now. Strange, that in the villanies among those of the last hundred years, even the Israelites could not have seen the demoralizing effect of the bad passions engendered and inflamed by war.] This was the fault, that he had no orders from God to do it, nor was there any occasion for it. It was a needless trouble, both to himself and to his people. Some think it was an affront to the ancient promise God made to Abraham, that his seed should be innumerable as the dust of the earth. it savored of distrust, or a design to show that the promise was not fulfilled. He would number those of whom God had said that they could not be numbered. Those know not what they do, that go about to disprove the word of God. The worst thing in it was, David did it in the pride of his heart, as Hezekiah showed his treasures. (1.) It was a proud conceit of his own greatness, in having the command of so numerous a people, as if their increase had been owing to any conduct of his, which was to be ascribed purely to the blessing of God. (2.) It was a proud confidence in his own strength. By publishing among the nations the number of his people, he thought to appear the more formidable; and doubted not, if he should have any war, he should overpower his enemies with the multitude of his forces; trusting in an arm of flesh, more than he should have done, who had written so much of trusting in God only. God judges not of sin as we do. What appears to us harmless, or, at least, but a small offence, may be a great sin in the eye of God, who sees men's principles, and is a Discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. [Besides, if a sin be indeed 'little,' what a bad state must that heart be in which will displease God for such a trifle! How can any sin be little, or how can we judge of the degrees of sin, when the nature of our obligations to God is so incomprehensible, so infinite!] His judgment, we are sure, is according to truth.

2. The spring from which it is here said to arise, is yet more strange, v. 1. It is not strange the anger of the Lord should be kindled against Israel; there was cause enough for it, they were unthankful for the blessings of David's government, and strangely drawn in to take part with Absalom first, and afterward with Sheba: we have reason to think their peace and plenty made them secure and sensual, and for this God was displeased with them: but that, in this displeasure, He should move David to number the people, is very strange. We are sure God is not the author of sin: He tempts no man: we are told (1 Chr. 21: 1.) Satan provoked David to number Israel; Satan, as an enemy, suggested it for a sin, as he put it into the heart of Judas to betray Christ. God, as a righteous Judge, permitted it, with a design, from this sin of David, to take an occasion to punish other sins of Israel, which He might justly have punished them for, without this. But,

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1, 2. The Israelites had offended God, by their ungrateful and repeated rebellions against David; by not duly profiting under the means employed for the revival of religion; and probably by that pride, luxury, and ungodliness, which generally spring from great prosperity; and it is likely they had not been amended by correction; (21:1—14.) but some think, the sin immediately intended was, their setting up Absalom for king, and rebelling against David. (1 Sam. 8:6—9. Hos. 8:2—4.) This David had cordially forgiven: but it was a national defection from God, which He did not judge it proper to leave unpunished. So that he permitted Satan to tempt and prevail against David, that in chastising him, he might punish them. David's thought and purpose of numbering the people, sprang from his remaining depravity, excited by Satan's suggestions: and as this 'was of the LORD,' (in the same manner, that it was of Him that the Canaanites should be hardened, and that Ahab should be deceived,) He withdrew every internal or external restraint, and left him to follow his own counsels. (M. R. b.) Thus, by a manner of expression common in Scripture, the Lord is said to have 'moved David against Israel;' for certainly this is the most natural construction of the words. (M.—Note, 1 Chr. 21:1.) But other passages prove, that the sinful disposition and resolution could not be from God, though He both permitted them, and over-ruled them to accomplish his own wise and righteous purposes: and this example throws light on the doctrine of God's providential government of the world, and suggests many practical instructions. (12:11, 12. Gen. 50:20. 1 K. 22:19—23.)

SCOTT.

Joab readily perceived, David's purpose arose from ambition, and was inconsistent with his character and interest; and that if he persevered to 'delight in,' or require, 'such a thing, it would be a cause of trespass,' i. e. of guilt and punishment, 'to Israel.' (1 Chr. 21:3.) On this occasion he spoke with great reason and temper; expressed much affection both for his prince and country; and even assumed an appearance of piety: and David would have shown his wisdom, had he yielded to his remonstrances. Yet the king's word prevailed, but 'it was abominable to Joab:' (1 Chr. 21:6.) and as he and the captains set about it reluctantly, we may suppose that they did not perform it very exactly. 'It is something strange, that Joab should see the danger of this, and David not think of it; no, not when it was so plainly represented to him. But the best of men are sometimes very drowsy, and apprehend not those things, which plainly appear to those who are not so good.' Patrick. A considerable degree of self-will and precipitation was manifested in David's conduct, respecting this measure.

as before, He brought a famine on them for the sin of Saul, so now, a pestilence for the sin of David; that princes may, from these instances, learn, when the judgments of God are abroad, to suspect that their sins are the ground of the controversy, and may therefore repent and reform themselves, which should have a great influence on national repentance and reformation; and that people may learn to pray for those in authority, that God would keep them from sin; because if they sin, the kingdom smarts.

II. Joab's opposition to these orders. Even he was aware of David's folly and vain-glory in this design. He observed David gave no reason for it, only, Number the people, that I may know the number of the people; he therefore endeavors to divert his pride, and in a much more decent manner than he had before used to divert his passion on the death of Absalom; then he spake rudely and insolently, (ch. 19: 5—7.) but now, as became him, v. 3. It is his wish, both that their number might increase, and that the king, though old, might live to see it, and have the satisfaction of it. But why doth my lord the king delight in this thing? What need is there of doing it? Leave it to the poor to count their flocks. Especially, why should David, who speaks so much of delighting in God, and the exercises of devotion, and who, being old, one would think, should have put away childish things, take a pleasure (so he calls it modestly, but means taking a pride) in a thing of this nature? Note, Many things, not in themselves sinful, turn into sin to us by our inordinate delighting in them. Joab was aware of David's vanity herein, but he himself was not. It would be good for us to have a friend that would faithfully admonish us, when we say or do any thing proud or vain glorious, for we often do so, and are not ourselves aware of it.

III. The orders executed notwithstanding, v. 4. Joab must not gainsay it, lest he be thought to grudge his time and pains in the king's service. It is an unhappiness to great men, to have those about them, that will aid them and serve them in what is evil; Joab, according to order, applied himself with some reluctancy to this unpleasing task, and took the captains of the host to help him.

V. 10—17. We have here David repenting of the sin, and yet punished for it; God repenting of the judgment, and David thereby made more penitent.

I. Here is David's penitent reflection, and confession of his sin in numbering the people. While the thing was in doing, all those nine months, we do not find that he was sensible of his sin, (for then he would have countermanded the orders he had given;) but when the account was finished, and laid before him, that very night, his conscience was awakened, and he felt the pain of it, just then when he promised himself the pleasure of it, v. 10. 1. He was convinced of his sin; his heart smote him, before the prophet came to him; v. 11. I think it should be read, and when David was up, (so it is in the original,) his conscience showed him the evil of what he had done; now that appeared sin, and exceeding sinful, in which, before, he saw no harm. 2. He confessed it to God, and begged earnestly for forgiveness. True penitents, whose consciences are tender and well informed, see that evil in sin, which others do not see. He owns he had done foolishly, very foolishly; he cries to God for pardon: I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant. If we confess our sins, we may pray in faith that God will forgive them, and take away, by pardoning mercy, that iniquity which we cast away by sincere repentance.

II. The just and necessary correction he suffered for this sin. David, under the sense of his sin, arose in the morning, expecting to hear of God's displeasure against him for what he had done, or designing to speak with Gad his seer about it. Gad is called his seer, because always at hand to advise with him; but God prevented him, and directed the prophet what to say to him, v. 11. David must be corrected; it is too great a crime, and reflects too much dishonor on God, to go un-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. In the righteous government of God, rulers and their subjects have a reciprocal influence on one another, and cannot sin or suffer without being mutually affected. Instead therefore of mutual recriminations under public calamities, however occasioned, all parties should be reminded to repent of their own sins, and to practise their own duties.—The remains of sin live, and will often revive, in the best of men, as long as they continue in this world: and the wisest are soon induced to do very foolishly, when God leaves them to themselves, and permits Satan to tempt them: and against this there is no security, except humble watchfulness and unceasing prayer.—Pride mixes with and defiles the best of our services. Even the believer often sacrilegiously assumes to himself the glory which belongs to God; and becomes vain of those endowments or possessions, which he had no share in procuring, and cannot secure for one hour! Through this hateful principle it comes to pass, that we so readily can spy a mote in our brother's eye, and yet remain unconscious of a beam in our own: so that even ungodly men can discern those evil tempers and that unbecoming conduct in eminent believers, to which themselves are insensible! (Matt. 7: 3—5.) This should warn Christians to walk circumspectly, lest their mistakes should encourage others in unbelief and ungodliness: and it is sometimes a part of our chastisement, to be shamed and rebuked by men of very bad characters. Yet those who have no real piety may, on personal and relative accounts, be sincerely attached to the interests of true Christians; and in a certain way have the cause of religion much at heart, as it happens to be connected with that of their party or their friends: but they cannot love the disciple simply because he loves and bears the image of his Master. They sometimes however give good advice, supported by solid arguments: they can foresee consequences which the believer does not suspect, and sincerely endeavor to prevent them; and they can mingle their expostulations with affectionate good wishes, and a kind of prayers for their welfare and success. These things do not prove a man to be a partaker of the grace of God, but they entitle him so far to the attention of godly persons. When authority prevails against reason and truth, pernicious effects must follow: yet this is so common, that those who possess much power and influence, rarely acquit themselves honorably as professors of godliness.—Men seldom accomplish to good purpose those services, in which they engage reluctantly: and God does not generally allow those whom He loves, the satisfactions which they sinfully covet. this place: probably, it was a tract of low land, [newly conquered,] which had lately been taken possession of by the Gileadites, in the N. part of the country. SCOTT.

Verse 9.

The numbers, as stated in Chronicles, are very different from those here given: and in order to reconcile them, it is thought that the regular troops, serving in rotation every month, and amounting to 288,000, (besides their officers, as it is supposed,) are included in the one account, but not in the other. (Note, 1 Chr. 27:1—15.) If these are added to the men of Israel as here numbered, and a due proportion taken from the men of Judah for their part of this militia, the round numbers will amount to nearly the same in both places.—This is, however, uncertain: and as Levi and Benjamin were not numbered, we may suppose that in other respects the accounts were inaccurate: and it might please God thus to order it, that David at last 'might not know the number of the people.' (1 Chr. 21:2—6. 27:23, 24.)—It is remarkable that the Israelites had not multiplied when possessed of Canaan, in proportion to what they had done during their bondage in Egypt. (Ex. 1:7.) ID.

[a] In 1 Chr. 21:5. 1,100,000 are assigned to Israel, 470,000 to Judah. Neither of the sums is too great; but they cannot both be right. More corruptions are found, in fact, in the numbers of the historical books of the O. T. than in any other part of the Sacred Records. Let us acknowledge, what cannot be successfully denied, that, although the original writers were under the influence of the Divine Spirit, yet we are not told that the same influence descended on all copiers of their words, so as absolutely to preclude mistakes.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 11.

Literally: 'And David arose in the morning, and the word of the LORD was unto the prophet Gad.' Gad compiled, in part at least, the annals of David's last years. (1 Chr. 29:29, 30.)—Had David's history been written, in the manner of modern memoirs, by friends of the deceased, how many things would have been concealed, or thrown into the back-ground! how much palliated! and what eulogiums would have been paid to his excellent and honorable actions. Thus David's character would have appeared more faultless: but his history would have been, in exact proportion, so much the less instructive. SCOTT.

Verses 12—14.

Though the Lord intended to forgive the sin of his repenting servant, as to his personal concern; yet as it was a public offence, He would correct it in a public manner, by destroying his subjects before his eyes. (Notes, 1, 2. 2 Kings 23:26, 27. 24:3, 4. 2 Chr. 33:12—17.)—

LORD, [z] I offer thee three things; choose thee one of them, [a] that I may do it unto thee.

13 So Gad came to David, and told him, and said unto him, Shall [b] seven years of famine come unto thee in thy land? or wilt thou [c] flee three months before thine enemies, while they pursue thee? or that there be [d] three days' pestilence in thy land? now advise, and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me.

14 And David said unto Gad, [e] I am in a great strait: let us fall now into the hand of the LORD; [f] for his mercies are * great: and [g] let me not fall into the hand of man.

15 So [h] the LORD sent a pestilence upon Israel from the morning even to the time appointed: and there died of the people [i] from Dan even to Beer-sheba [d] seventy thousand men.

16 And when [l] the angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it, the LORD [m] repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed the people, [n] It is enough: stay now thine hand. And the angel of the LORD was by the threshing-place of [o] Araunah [p] the Jebusite.

17 And David [q] spake unto the LORD, when he saw the angel that smote the people, and said, [r] Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly: but [s] these sheep, what have they done? [t] let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house.

punished, even in David himself: of the seven things God hates, pride is the first, Prov. 6: 17. Note, Those who truly repent of their sins, and have them pardoned, yet are often made to smart for them in this world. He was proud of the numbers of his people; therefore the judgment he must be chastised with for this sin, must be such as will make them fewer. Note, What we make the matter of our pride, it is just with God to take from us, or imbitter to us; and, some way or other, to make the matter of our punishment. It must be such a punishment as the people must have a large share in, for God's anger was kindled against Israel, v. 1. Though David's sin immediately opened the sluice, the sins of the people all contributed to the deluge.

Now as to the punishment to be inflicted,

(1.) David is bid to choose what rod he will be beaten with, v. 12, 13. God, by putting him thus to his choice, designed to humble him the more for his sin, which he would see to be exceeding sinful, when he came to consider each of these judgments as exceeding dreadful; to upbraid him with the proud conceit he had of his own sovereignty over Israel: or, to give him some encouragement under the correction, letting him know God did not cast him out of communion with Himself, but that still his secret was with Him, and in afflicting him, He considered his frame, and what he could best bear: or, that he might the more patiently bear the rod, when it was a rod of his own choosing. The prophet bids him advise with himself, and then tell him what answer he should return to Him that sent him. Note, Ministers are sent of God to us, and they must give an account of the success of their embassy; it concerns us therefore to consider, what answer they shall return from us.

(2.) He excepts only against the judgment of the sword, and, for the other two, refers himself to God, but intimates his choice of the pestilence rather, v. 14. Note, Sin brings men into straits; wise and good men often distress themselves by their own folly. To fall into the hand of man, that would sully all the glory of his triumphs, and occasion the enemies of God and Israel to behave themselves proudly. See Deut. 32: 26, 27. Their tender mercies also are cruel; and in three months they will do more damage than many years will repair. Therefore He casts himself on God. Men are God's hand, Ps. 17: 14. some judgments are more immediately from his hand than others, as famine and pestilence; and which of these shall be the scourge, he refers it to God, who chooses the shortest, that he might the sooner testify his being reconciled. But some think David, by these words, intimates his choice of the pestilence. The land had not yet recovered [from] the famine under which it smarted 3 years on the Gibeonites' account, therefore let us not be corrected with that rod, for that also will be the triumph of our neighbors; hence we read of the reproach of famine; (Ezek. 36: 30.) but, if Israel must be diminished, let it be by the pestilence, for that is falling into the hands of the Lord, who usually inflicted that judgment by the hand of his own immediate servants, the angels, as in the death of the first-born of Egypt. That is a judgment to which David himself, and his own family, lie as open as the meanest subject, but not so, either to famine or sword, therefore David, tenderly conscious of his guilt, chooses that. It is a dreadful thing, the apostle says, to fall into the hands of the living God; but David, a penitent, dares cast himself into God's hand, knowing he shall find that his mercies are great. Good men, even when under God's frowns, yet entertain no other than good thoughts of Him Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him.

(3.) A pestilence is, accordingly, sent, (v. 15.) from Dan to Beer-sheba, from one end of the kingdom to the other, which shows it to come immediately from God's hand, and not from any natural causes: David has his choice, he suffers by miracle, and not by ordinary means. For continuance, it lasted from morning (this very morning on which it was put to David's choice) to the third day, so Mr. Poole: or only to the evening of the first day, the time appointed for the evening sacrifice, so Patrick and others, who reckon it lasted but nine hours, and that, in compassion to David, God shortened the time first mentioned. The execution the pestilence did, was very severe, 70,000 that were all well, sickened and died, in a few hours. See the power of the angels, when God gives them commission, either to save or to destroy: Joab is nine months in passing with his pen, the angel but nine hours in passing with his sword, through all the coasts and corners of the land of Israel. How easily God can bring down the proudest sinners, and how much we owe daily to the divine patience. David's adultery is punished, for the present, only with the death of one infant; his pride, with the death of all those thousands, so much does God hate pride. The number slain amounts almost to a half decimation; 70,000 was about one in twenty: now we may suppose, David's flesh trembled for fear of God, and he was afraid of his judgments, Ps. 119: 120.

III. God's gracious relaxation of the judgment, when it began to be inflicted on Jerusalem, v. 16. The country had drunk of the bitter cup, but Jerusalem must drink the dregs: perhaps there was more wickedness, especially more pride, (and that was the sin now chastised,) in Jerusalem than elsewhere, therefore the hand of the destroyer is stretched out upon that: but then the Lord repented Him of the evil, changed not his mind, but his way, and said to the destroying angel, It is enough; stay now thine hand, and let mercy rejoice against judgment. See here how ready God is to forgive, and how little pleasure He takes in punishing; and let it encourage us to meet Him by repentance in the Only three years of famine are proposed in Chronicles: (1 Chr. 21:12.) but such variations frequently occur, and are probably owing to some trivial errors of transcribers in so long a course of years; especially as the numbers were often distinguished by marks [or letters] which might the more easily be mistaken.—'They that fear the Lord will prepare their hearts, and humble their souls in his sight, saying, We will fall into the hands of the LORD, and not into the hands of men: for as his majesty is, so is his mercy.' Ecclesiasticus 2:17, 18. (Heb. 10:31.) SCOTT.

(14.) 'David acted nobly: had he chosen war, his own personal safety was not risked; because an ordinance prevented his going to battle. Had he chosen famine, his own wealth would have secured his and his family's support: but he showed the greatness of his mind in choosing the pestilence, to which himself and household were exposed equally with the meanest of his subjects.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(15, 16.) 'The time appointed' may mean either, the close of the third day: or, more probably, the appointed hour of evening sacrifice on the first day. For 'the LORD repented Him of the evil,' implying that He did not proceed to the extent of the judgment denounced. SCOTT.

Verse 17.

Probably, the angel [note, John 5:4.] had before been invisible: but at length 'David lifted up his eyes, and saw the angel of the LORD stand between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand, stretched out over Jerusalem. Then David and the elders of Israel, who were clothed in sackcloth, fell upon their faces.' 1 Chr. 21:16, 17. The 'drawn sword' was an emblem of the divine justice about to be executed on the city. David had before humbled himself in the sight of God, and, no doubt, had earnestly interceded for the people; but this sight affected him more than ever: and, while he and the elders prostrated themselves on the ground, he poured out his soul before God in fervent prayer for his subjects, and especially for Jerusalem. His guilt indeed occasioned the judgment: but the people were far from that innocency which David supposed; for their wickedness was in reality the cause of the calamity. (Note, 1, 2.) His intercession however prevailed: and it was doubtless in answer to his prayer, that the LORD said to the destroying angel, 'It is enough: stay now thine hand.' SCOTT.

18 ¶ And [u] Gad came that day to David, and said unto him, Go up, rear an altar unto the LORD, in the threshing-floor of * Araunah the Jebusite.

19 And David, according to the saying of Gad, went up [x] as the LORD commanded.

20 And Araunah looked, and saw the king and his servants coming on toward him: and Araunah went out, and [y] bowed himself before the king on his face upon the ground.

21 And Araunah said, [z] Wherefore is my lord the king come to his servant? and David said, [a] To buy the threshing-floor of thee, to build an altar unto the LORD, that [b] the plague may be stayed from the people.

22 And Araunah said unto David, [c] Let my lord the king take and offer up what seemeth good unto him: behold here be [d] oxen for burnt-sacrifice, and threshing-instruments, and other instruments of the oxen for wood.

23 All these things did Araunah, [e] as a king, give unto the king. And Araunah said unto the king, [f] The LORD thy God accept thee.

24 And the king said unto Araunah, [g] Nay; but I will surely buy it of thee at a price: neither will I offer burnt-offerings unto the LORD my God, of that which doth cost me nothing. [h] So David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver.

25 And David [i] built there an altar unto the LORD, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings. [k] So the LORD was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel.

way of his judgments. This was on mt. Moriah. [The Jews say, this was the place of Cain's and Abel's offerings.] Lightfoot observes, that in the very place where Abraham, by a countermand from heaven, was stayed from slaying his son, this angel, by a like countermand, was stayed from destroying Jerusalem. It is for the sake of the great Sacrifice, that our forfeited lives are preserved from the destroying angel.

IV. David's renewed repentance for his sin on this occasion, v. 17. Note, True penitents, the more they receive of God's sparing, pardoning mercy, the more humbled they are for sin, and the more resolved against it. They shall be ashamed, when I am pacified toward them, Ezek. 16: 63. Observe, 1. How he criminates himself, as if he could never speak ill enough of his own fault; so willing was he to accept the punishment of his iniquity. 2. How he intercedes for the people, whose bitter lamentations made his heart ache, and his ears tingle; These sheep, what have they done? Done! Why they had done much amiss; it was their sin that provoked God to leave David himself to do as he did; yet, as became a penitent, he is severe on his own faults, while he extenuates theirs. Most people, when God's judgments are abroad, charge others with being the cause of them, and care not who falls by them, so they can escape; but David's penitent and public spirit was otherwise affected. Let this remind us of the grace of our Lord Jesus, who gave Himself for our sins, and was willing God's hand should be against Him, that we might escape.

V. 18—25. Here is, I. A command sent to David, to erect an altar in the place where he saw the angel, v. 18. God's encouraging us to offer to Him spiritual sacrifices, is a comfortable evidence of his reconciling us to Himself. Peace is made between God and sinners by sacrifice, not otherwise, even by Christ, the great Propitiation, of whom all the legal sacrifices were types. It is for his sake, the destroying angel is bid to stay his hand. When God's judgments are graciously stayed, we ought to acknowledge it with thankfulness, to his praise. This altar was to be for thank-offerings. See Isa. 12: 1.

II. David's purchase hereunto. It seems, the owner was a Jebusite: proselyted, no doubt, to the Jewish religion, though by birth a Gentile, and therefore allowed, not only to dwell among the Israelites, but to have a possession of his own in a city, Lev. 25: 29, 30. Now,

1. David went in person to the owner, to treat with him. See his justice; he would not so much as use it in the present exigence, though the proprietor was an alien, though himself a king, and though he had express orders from God to rear an altar there, till he had bought it, and paid for it. God hates robbery for burnt-offering. See his humility, how far he was from taking state; though a king, he was now a penitent, therefore, in token of his self-abasement, he neither sent for Araunah to come to him, nor sent another to deal with him, but went himself; (v. 19.) and, though it looked like a diminution of himself, he lost no honor by it; Araunah, when he saw him, went and bowed himself to the ground before him, v. 20. Great men will be never the less respected for their humility, but the more.

2. Araunah generously offered him, not only the ground to build his altar on, but oxen for sacrifices, and other things that might be of use to him in the service, (v. 22.) all, gratis, and a prayer besides: The Lord thy God accept thee! He gave as a king, (v. 23.) though an ordinary subject, he had the spirit of a prince. In the Hebrew it is, He gave, even the king to the king, whence it is supposed Araunah had been king of the Jebusites in that place; or was descended from their royal family, though now tributary to David. [Hamelec, the king, is not in the Sept. Syr. Arab. 3 of Ken. and De Rossi's mss. nor in the paral. pass. in Chr. Perhaps it should be, "Araunah gave unto the king." Clarke.] He greatly honored David, though his conqueror, on the score of his personal merits. He had also an affection for Israel, and earnestly desired the plague might be stayed; and the honor of its being stayed at his threshing-floor he would account a valuable consideration for all he now tendered to David.

3. David resolves to pay the full value of it, and does so, v. 24. [Otherwise it would have been, says Clarke, Araunah's not David's offering.] He would not take advantage of the pious Jebusite's generosity; he thanks him, no doubt, for his kind offer, but pays him now for the floor and the oxen, for the present service, and afterward for the ground adjoining, to build the temple on. Note, Those know not what religion is, all whose care it is, to make it cheap and easy to themselves, and who are best pleased with that which costs them least pains or money. What have we our substance for, but to honor God with it; and how can it be better bestowed?

III. The building of the altar, and the offering of the proper sacrifices on it; (v. 25.) burnt-offerings, to the glory of God's justice in the execution that had been done; and peace-offerings, to the glory of his mercy in the seasonable staying of the process. Hereupon, God showed (it is supposed by fire from heaven consuming the sacrifices) that He was entreated for the land, and that it was in mercy the plague was removed, and in token of God's being reconciled both to prince and people. Christ is our Altar, our Sacrifice; in Him alone we may expect to find favor with God, to escape his wrath, and the flaming sword of the cherubim, which keeps the way of the tree of life.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 10—25. When God corrects the transgressions of his people, He makes them, by the anguish of their souls, in the great straits to which He reduces them, taste the bitterness of their sins, and perceive his abhorrence of them.—Whatever we idolize, or grow proud of, will generally be taken from us, or converted into a source of distress; and no aggravation or affliction is more painful to generous minds, than the reflection, that others, whom they love, are suffering on their account.—While ministers mourn over the state of their congregations; they may sometimes profitably inquire, whether their own supineness, pride, and desire of applause or popularity; their want of zeal and simplicity; their self-indulgence, or conformity to the world, do not blight their labors, although more open evils do not blot their profession? and whether the people's souls are not suffering for their correction; and to bring them to deeper humiliation, greater fervency in prayer, and a more simple, spiritual frame of mind, and devotedness to God? And surely we should choose to be chastened in our own persons, rather than that the blessing should be withheld from our congregations: for, though the Lord is righteous in these dispensations; yet the people have not deserved at our hands, that we should occasion this evil to them.—Grace teaches men to condemn themselves rather than others, and to seek the interests of their fellow creatures in many respects before their own: and earnest prayers offered in this temper of mind, by those who unreservedly cast themselves on the mercies of the Lord, are very prevalent. For 'He is slow to anger, and ready to forgive:' and He never fails of his promises, though He readily recedes from his threatenings in behalf of the humbled sinner.—If the power of angels, as it appears in this chapter, is so terrible, what is that of the Almighty Creator! and as they are so obedient to their Maker's word, and so prompt in executing his will; we ought carefully to imitate them, especially in the delightful service of 'ministering to the heirs of salvation.' SCOTT.

AN EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, AND NOTES,

UPON THE FIRST BOOK OF KINGS.

THE holy Scripture is the history of the kingdom of God among men, under the several administrations of it. The particular history now before us, is that of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel; yet with special regard to the kingdom of God among them; for still it is a sacred history, much more instructive, nor less entertaining, than any of the histories of the kings of the earth, to which (those of them that are of any certainty) it is prior in time.

The Bible began with the story of Patriarchs, Prophets, and Judges, men whose converse with heaven was more immediate, (the record of which strengthens our faith,) but is not so easily accommodated to our case, (now that we expect not visions,) as the subsequent history of affairs like ours, under the direction of common providence; and here also we find, though not many, types and figures of the Messiah, yet great expectations of Him: for not only prophets, but kings, desired to see the great mysteries of the Gospel, Luke 10: 24.

The two books of Samuel are introductions to the books of the Kings, as they relate the origin of the royal government in Saul, and of the royal family in David. These two books give us an account of David's successor, Solomon, the division of his kingdom, and the succession of the several kings both of Judah and Israel, with an abstract of their history down to the captivity. And as from the book of Genesis we may collect excellent rules of economics, for the good governing of families; so, from these books, of politics, for the directing of public affairs. There is in them special regard had to the house and lineage of David, from which Christ came. Some of his sons trod in his steps, others did not. The characters of the kings of Judah may be thus briefly given:—David the devout, Solomon the wise, Rehoboam the simple, Abijah the valiant, Asa the upright, Jehoshaphat the religious, Jehoram the wicked, Ahaziah the profane, Joash the backslider, Amaziah the rash, Uzziah the mighty, Jotham the peaceable, Ahaz the idolater, Hezekiah the reformer, Manasseh the penitent, Amon the obscure, Josiah the tender-hearted, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, all wicked, and such as brought ruin quickly on themselves and their kingdom. The number of the good and bad is nearly equal, but the reigns of the good were generally long, and those of the bad, short. This consideration will make the state of Israel not altogether so bad in this period as, at first, it seems. In this first book, we have, I. The death of David, ch. 1. and 2. II. The glorious reign of Solomon, and his building of the temple; (ch. 3—10.) but the cloud his sun set under, ch. 11. III. The division of the kingdoms in the reign of Rehoboam, and his reign and Jeroboam's, ch. 12—14. IV. The reigns of Abijah and Asa over Judah, Baasha and Omri over Israel, ch. 15. and 16. V. Elijah's miracles, ch. 17—19. VI. Ahab's success against Ben-hadad, his wickedness and fall, ch. 20—22. And, in all this history, it appears that kings, though gods to us, are men to God, mortal and accountable. HENRY.

The history contained in the two books of the Kings, extends through a period of about 427 years. The two seem originally to have formed but one book; but they were afterwards divided into two, and called 'The first and second books of the Kings;' and in some versions, 'The third and fourth books of the Kings;' as the two books of Samuel are, in the Sept and Vulg. called 'The first and the second books of the Kings.'—It is evident, they contain an abstract from more copious records, which seem to have been collected and preserved by contemporary prophets. (11:41. 14:29. 15:31. 22:39, 45 2 Chr. 9:29. 12:15. 13:22. 20:34. 26:22.) Indeed, a considerable part of the transactions of their own times is recorded, in connection with the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. It is, however, uncertain by whom this compilation was made: but if Ezra, as is generally and probably supposed, compiled the books of Chronicles; it is not likely, that, (according to some learned men,) he compiled these also: as they form a distinct history of the same times. If, therefore, they were arranged in the present manner, principally by one sacred writer, those, who ascribe them to Jeremiah, seem to have adopted the more probable opinion. Indeed, the second book of the Kings and his prophecy end with the narrative of the same events; though, perhaps, both were added after his death by another hand: and it is not unlikely, that some other trivial alterations were made in the days of Ezra, [Bp. GRAY remarks, that the Chaldaic names, by which the months are denominated in these books, were not used by the Jews, till in or after the captivity.] to render the narrative more perspicuous to the Jews after [their return from Babylon].—They have, however, been constantly received, both by Jews and Christians, as a part of the sacred canon, the holy Scriptures: and the events recorded are frequently referred to in the N. T. (Matt. 1:7—12. 6:29. 12:42. Luke 4:25—27. Acts 2:29. 7:47—50. Jam. 5:17, 18.) It is observable also, that our Lord and his apostle James not only speak of them as authentic records, and a part of the sacred oracles received by the Jews; but especially attest some of the most wonderful miracles recorded in them; and thus affix a direct sanction to them, as given by inspiration of God.—They also contain many prophecies; especially that of Josiah, who was foretold by name 300 years before his birth: (1 K. 13:2.) but none of these predictions, in their most evident literal meaning, refer to events later than the Babylonish captivity.—After the death of David, the sacred historian records the principal transactions of Solomon's long and peaceable reign; [recounts his great wisdom, his magnificence, and his fall; Dr. A. CLARKE.] and under his successor, the nation was divided into the two distinct kingdoms of Judah and Israel.—The descendants of Solomon reigned over that of Judah till the captivity, for about 387 years. So that, from the accession of David, during a course of 467 years, the throne was filled by his descendants, in lineal descent, except as the sons of Josiah succeeded one another. During this long term of years, there was not a single revolution, or civil war; and but one short interruption, by Athaliah's usurpation. Perhaps it would be difficult to find, in universal history, any thing equal to this permanent internal order and tranquillity. Let the reader recollect how many revolutions, civil wars, murders of reigning kings by rivals and successors, and changes in the succession, are found in the English history, during the same number of years.—Above half the kings of Judah supported true religion, and several of them were eminently pious men: and it is remarkable that their reigns were much longer, than those of the wicked princes; (11:42. 15:10. 22:42. 2 K. 15:2,33. 18:2. 22:1.) so that they comprise much above 300 years of this period; and the greatest part of this time was evidently passed, either in profound peace, or in remarkable prosperity. Let this state of things be compared with the history of Greece or Rome; and the situation of Judah must be allowed to have been exceedingly more desirable, than that of these celebrated heathen nations.—The kingdom of Israel continued about 254 years, till the Assyrian captivity. The nineteen kings, of several families, who, during this period, reigned in succession, were all idolaters, and most of them monsters of iniquity: yet the Lord by his prophets, especially by Elijah and Elisha, preserved a considerable degree of true religion in the land, till the measure of their national wickedness was full; and then they were finally dispersed among the Gentiles: except as a remnant of them was, in various ways, and at different times, incorporated among the Jews.—In these books the history of the two kingdoms is carried on together: and the whole forms an admirable comment on the prophecies delivered to the nation by Moses and Joshua; (Lev. 26: Deut. 4: 28: 29: 30: 31: 32: Josh. 23:15, 16.) and a striking illustration of the proverb, 'Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is the reproach of any people.'—This first book contains the history of about 120 years. Connected with the peace and prosperity of Solomon's reign, and the fame of his wisdom, a full account is given of the temple having been built by him. God had commanded Israel to offer all their sacrifices at one place; Shiloh had for some time been that place; and the ark had been removed to Zion, by David, in order that a temple might there be built, which Solomon his son accomplished. (Deut. 12:5—7.) A large proportion of the subsequent parts of the O. T. relates to this temple; to the sins of the people in sacrificing elsewhere; to their profanation of the temple; to the judgments of God upon them for these crimes; especially to the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans; and to the rebuilding of it by Zerubbabel: and these things so run through all the subsequent history and prophecies, that, if Solomon did not build the temple by the express command of God, it must follow, that God punished the nation with tremendous judgments for violating merely human appointments.—When the Samaritans preferred mount Gerizim, our Lord told the woman of Samaria, they 'knew not what they worshipped, for salvation was of the Jews:' and this declaration, with his own constant attendance at the ordinances administered at the temple in Jerusalem, sufficiently attests the divine inspiration of those records, in which alone it is expressly declared, that Solomon built the temple by the direction and appointment of God Himself.—Solomon's fall into idolatry seems evidently implied in the book of Ecclesiastes: and the history of Rehoboam's imprudence, the division of his kingdom, Jeroboam's idolatry, and the subsequent events to the end of the book, are assumed as undoubted facts in the writings of all the prophets. So entirely does the whole canon of Scripture coincide; while each part confirms, and receives confirmation from, all the rest. SCOTT.

CHAP. I.

Abishag is procured to cherish David, in his old age and sickness, 1—4. Adonijah gains over Joab and Abiathar, and aspires to the throne, 5—10. Nathan counsels Bathsheba, who speaks to David, and is seconded by Nathan, 11—27. David assures Bathsheba, by an oath, that Solomon shall succeed him; and gives orders that he should, that day, be anointed and proclaimed king, 28—37. Zadok, Benaiah, and Nathan, zealously execute these orders, and the people rejoice, 38—40. Jonathan informs Adonijah and his company; and they hastily disperse, 41—49. Adonijah flees to the horns of the altar, and obtains from Solomon a conditional pardon, 50—53.

NOW king David was [a] old [b] and [*] stricken in years; and they covered him with clothes, but he gat no heat.

2 Wherefore his servants said unto him, [†] Let there be sought for my lord the king [‡] a young virgin: and let her [d] stand before the king, and let her [§] cherish him, and let her [e] lie in thy bosom, that my lord the king may [f] get heat.

3 So [g] they sought for a fair damsel throughout all the coasts of Israel, and found [h] Abishag a [i] Shunammite, and brought her to the king.

4 And the damsel was very fair, and cherished the king, and ministered to him: but the king [k] knew her not.

5 ¶ Then [l] Adonijah the son of Haggith [m] exalted himself, saying, [n] I will [‖] be king: and [o] he prepared him chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him.

6 And his father [p] had not displeased him [¶] at any time in saying, Why

CHAP. 1. V. 1—4. We have David here sinking under the infirmities of old age, and brought by them to the gates of the grave. He that cometh up out of the pit, shall fall into the snare; and, one way or other, we must needs die.

I. It would have troubled one to see David so infirm, v. 1. He was now 70 years old. Many, at that age, are as lively and fit for business as ever: but David was now chastised for his former sins, especially that in the matter of Uriah, and felt from his former toils, and the hardships he had gone through in his youth, which then he made nothing of, but was now the worse for. Let young people remember their Creator in the days of their youth, before these evil days come. When our strength is gone, it will be a comfort to remember that we used it well.

II. It would have troubled one to see his physicians so weak and unskilful, that they knew no other way of relieving him, than by outward applications. Clothes, where there is any inward heat, will keep it in, and so increase it; but, where it is not, they have none to communicate, no, not royal clothing. Elihu understood not how our garments are warm upon us; (Job 37: 17.) but if God deny his blessing, men clothe them, and there is none warm; (Hag. 1: 6.) David here was not. They foolishly prescribed nuptials to one that should rather have been preparing for his funeral; (v. 2—4.) but his prophets should have been consulted as well as his physicians, in an affair of this nature. However, this might be excused then, when even good men ignorantly allowed themselves to have many wives. We now have not so learned Christ, but are taught, that one man must have but one wife; (Matt. 19: 5.) and further, that it is good for a man not to touch a woman, 1 Cor. 7: 1. That Abishag was married to David before she lay with him, and was his secondary wife, appears from its being imputed as a great crime to Adonijah, that he desired to marry her, (ch. 2: 22.) after his father's death.

V. 5—10. David had much affliction in his children; Amnon and Absalom had both been his grief; the one his first-born, the other his third. (2 Sam. 3: 2, 3.) his second, whom he had by Abigail, we will suppose he had comfort in; his fourth, Adonijah, (2 Sam. 3: 4.) one of those born in Hebron, we heard nothing of till now; and here we are told he was a comely person, and next in age, and (as it proved) next in temper, to Absalom, v. 6. And further, that in his father's eyes he had been a jewel, but was now a thorn.

I. His father had made a fondling of him, v. 6 It is not said, He never displeased his father; probably he had frequently, and his father was secretly troubled at his misconduct, and lamented it before God: but his father had not displeased him, either by crossing, or denying him, or by calling him to an account, as to what he had done, and where he had been, or by keeping him to his book or his business, or reproving him; he never said to him, Why hast thou done so? Because he saw it was uneasy to him, and he could not bear it without fretting. It was the son's fault that he was displeased at reproof, and took it for an affront, whereby he lost the benefit of it; and the father's, that, because he saw it displeased him, he did not reprove him; and now he justly smarted for indulging him. They who honor their sons more than God, as those do, who keep them not under good discipline, thereby forfeit the honor they might expect from their sons.

II. He, in return, made a fool of his father: because he was old, and confined to his bed, he thought no notice was to be taken of him; therefore he exalted himself, and said, I will be king, v. 5. Children that are indulged, learn to be proud and ambitious, and that is the ruin of a great many young people. The way to keep them humble, is, to keep them under. Observe Adonijah's insolence. 1. He looks upon the days of mourning for his father to be at hand, therefore prepares to succeed him, though he knew that by the designation both of God and David, Solomon was to be the man; (Chr. 22: 9. 23: 1.) which entail Adonijah attempted by force to cut off, in contempt both of God and his father. It argues a very base and wicked mind, for children to insult over their parents, because of the infirmities of their age.

In pursuance of this ambitious prospect, (1.) He got a great retinue, (v. 5.) chariots and horsemen, both for state and strength; to wait on him, and to fight for him. (2.) He made great interest with no less than Joab, the general of the army, and Abiathar the High Priest, v. 7. old men, who had been faithful to David, in the most difficult and troublesome of his times; men of sense and experience, who, one would think, would not easily be wheedled. But God, in this matter, left them to themselves, perhaps, to correct them for some former misconduct, with a scourge of their own making. We are told (v. 8.) who they were, of such approved fidelity to David, that Adonijah had not confidence to propose it to them; Zadok,

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. The counsel of his courtiers, or physicians, deserves much censure: though similar advice has been given in other ages and countries. [Roberts says, the custom is still common in the E. The parties generally are not married.] We may suppose, David acceded to it merely in compliance with their wishes, and in deference to their judgment; but the appearance was not at all becoming his character, and circumstances. (M. R.—2:15—18.) SCOTT.

Verses 5, 6.

After the death of Absalom, Adonijah was David's eldest son: and no doubt he considered the kingdom as his birth-right, and confided in the support of the people to seize upon it; without any regard to his father, or to the revealed will of God.—It is remarkable how frequent-hast thou done so? and he also was a [q] very goodly man; and his mother [r] bare him after Absalom.

7 And [*] he [s] conferred with [t] Joab the son of Zeruiah, and with [u] Abiathar the priest: and they † following Adonijah helped him.

8 But [v] Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and [x] Nathan the prophet, and [y] Shemei, and Rei, and [z] the mighty men which belonged to David, were not with Adonijah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. The most vigorous constitutions must soon wear out, and our lives hasten to a close: and, though proper means of restoring health and prolonging our days should be used; yet a pious and wise man ought not to yield to such expedients as have the appearance of evil, or may become temptations to him. —Indulgent parents are commonly chastised with disobedient children.—Every propensity gathers strength by being gratified.—So long as carnal self-love reigns in the heart, no worldly wisdom and experience, no maturity of age, no rank or station in the community or in the church, no previous fidelity or attachment to princes or patrons, can secure men's continuance in their former course or connections: for innumerable circumstances may occur, which may prompt them to some new method of attempting to gratify their reigning inclinations. So that disgust, fear, conscious guilt, or the hope of greater authority, influence, or wealth, may speedily induce them to measures, which stand in opposition to all their former lives! We ought therefore to depend on the Lord to preserve us from the deceitfulness of our own hearts, and from the fickleness and treachery of men.—Political wisdom frequently contradicts the Word of God, and proves in the event the greatest folly: and crafty seducers can discern who are, and who are not, fit for their purpose; and will shun determined, honest characters as their enemies and rivals.

SCOTT.

ly the first-born were set aside by his express appointment. In the ordinary course of things, it is expedient that the primogeniture should have the precedency; and the judicial law of Moses, (as well as the civil laws of most nations,) was formed accordingly. But the examples of Jacob, Judah, the sons of Joseph, David, Solomon, and others, prove that this is not grounded on moral obligation: that it is not divine, or unalterable, or to be put in competition with the welfare of whole nations, and the liberty and rights of all the rest of mankind; according to the sentiments of some authors, who most absurdly ground their doctrine on the Word of God, though it is evidently contradictory to it!—It is probable, Adonijah was of an imperious disposition. He seems to have greatly resembled his elder brother Absalom. SCOTT.

(6.) Nor had his father grieved him.] David's faults seem to have been occasioned by two causes; too great indulgence of the sexual propensity, and of the paternal feeling.—These propensities, like the others, gather strength by indulgence; and their undue indulgence is a sin punishable both here and hereafter. Had David always restrained these within proper bounds, what 'assurance of a man' would the history of his life furnish to us! What a model of well endowed humanity! Neither less nor more than man! Great was he in intellect and imagination—great in his moral nature, great in social feelings—greatest, in that he aimed to live, 'a man after God's own heart'—and to feel the spirit of the prayer, 'Father, thy will be done!' ED.

Verse 7.

Perhaps Joab, though attached to David, was not favorable to Solomon, and preferred Adonijah, as more congenial with his own disposition. Being destitute of piety, he disregarded the divine appointment, and deemed it more politic to place the eldest son on the throne; and no wrong to David, who, he might think, injured Adonijah in preferring his younger brother. Perhaps he was still afraid of being called to account for his murders; and hoped to secure himself, to continue his preferment, and to increase his influence, by helping Adonijah to the kingdom: and it may be supposed, that he secretly resented David's conduct in attempting to lay him aside, and to put Amasa in his place. (2 Sam. 19:9—15. 20:6—10.)—Abiathar, though high priest, seems to have been less regarded by David than Zadok was: (2 Sam. 15:24—29.) and perhaps he suspected Solomon would set his family aside, in favor of the line of Eleazar to which Zadok belonged. But by attaching himself to Adonijah, he hastened that event, and showed, that David had good reasons for preferring Zadok, who probably was a man of much deeper and more serious religion. (2:26, 27, 35. 1 Sam. 2:31—36. Ez. 44:15, 16.) SCOTT.

Verses 8—10.

It is highly improbable, that Shimei would be much regarded by either party [though he seems to have been able to command the wills of at least a thousand of his tribe. ED.]. (2:8, 9, 36—46.2 Sam. 16:5—14. 19:19—23.) Solomon afterwards preferred a person of this name: (4:18.) and probably he was a man of considerable consequence. (Zech. 12:9—14.)—We know nothing further of Rei, but no doubt he also was a person of rank and great influence.—The mighty men were the chieftains before enumerated. (2 Sam. 23:8—39.)—It is most likely that Adonijah made a solemn sacrifice, as well as a magnificent feast, on the occasion; and thus he concealed his designs, till ripe for execution. (2 Sam. 15:7—9.) ID.

Verses 11—14.

Had Adonijah succeeded, he would, no doubt, have put Solomon and Bath-sheba to death: for the history of the world demonstrates, that when men are aspiring after dominion, they are easily tempted to the most enormous crimes, which seem necessary for their purpose, even when most contrary to their apparent natural disposition. (Judg. 9:4—6. 2 K. 11:1, 2. Matt. 2:3—6, 16—18.) ID.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11—27. In every age men form designs, which their own consciences condemn as contrary to the will of God: and yet hope success from the favor and assistance of man! But those, who are vain of their own accomplishments, often flatter themselves with the imagined attachment of numbers, that have no real esteem or affection for them.—A feast, and a sacrifice, are proper baits to draw in the sensual or the unsuspecting: and aspiring men, according to the taste of the times, have always employed one or both of these expedients, to subserve their own ambitious purposes; by which numbers have been inadvertently betrayed to concur in criminal measures, contrary to their judgments, consciences, characters, and interests.—If a neighbor is in danger of being injured or murdered, without knowing it, or being able to avoid the snare; it must be the duty of every man, in all cases, or at any hazard, to give him warning or counsel, and to interpose for his preservation.—When others are neglecting their duty, through inattention or multiplied infirmities or engagements, they should be put in remembrance of it: when they are slack to do it, prudent contrivances, and quickening expostulations may be successfully employed to incite them; and every mean should be used to prevent manifest injustice, to exclude occasions of future discord, and to promote decisive measures for the glory of God, and the good of his people: for if the enemies of religion be combined, active, and daring; its friends should not be timid, supine, and disunited.—The most respectful behavior to our superiors is very consistent with plainness of speech in the great concerns of God: and such language and behavior, combined in persons of known and approved character, will be very forcible with men of piety and intregrity. SCOTT.

Verses 15—18.

It is not recorded, on what occasion David sware to Bath-sheba, that Solomon should succeed him: but it is supposed with probability, that it took place after Absalom's rebellion; and as God Himself had settled the succession, he might very properly give her this assurance. SCOTT.

Verse 20.

David, though anointed to the kingdom, did not assume regal authority at first, without the concurrence of the elders of Judah and Israel: (2 Sam. 2:4. 5:1—5.) and after Absalom's rebellion, he did not return to the exercise of it without their approbation. (2 Sam. 19:9—15.) He could not therefore claim a right to dispose of the kingdom by will, as if it had been his own private property, according to the statement of some writers: but he might very properly inform the people of the Lord's appointment in that behalf: (1 Sam. 8:19—22.) and so far were they from eagerly joining Adonijah, as they had done Absalom; that they remained in suspense, till his determination was notified. SCOTT.

Verse 23.

He bowed, &c.] The exterior indications of civil honor, to persons in authority, were generally rendered by the most eminent servants and prophets of God. The refusal of them may arise from an erroneous conscience, but it has the appearance of pride and affected moroseness. (Acts 26:25.) ID.

Verse 29. Gen. 48:16. 2 Sam. 4:9. ID.

32 And king David said, Call me [k]Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada. And they came before the king.

33 The king also said unto them, Take with you the servants of your lord, and cause Solomon my son [l] to ride upon * mine own [m] mule, and bring him down to [n] Gihon.

34 And let [o] Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet anoint him there king over Israel: and [p] blow ye with the trumpet, and say, [q] God save king Solomon.

35 Then ye shall come up after him, that he may come and [r] sit upon my throne; for he shall be king in my stead: and [s] I have appointed him to be ruler over Israel and over Judah.

36 And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada answered the king, and said, [t] Amen: [u] the LORD God of my lord the king say so too.

37 As [x] the LORD hath been with my lord the king, even so be he with Solomon, [y] and make his throne greater than the throne of my lord king David.

38 So [z] Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and [a] the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, went down, and caused Solomon to ride upon [b] king David's mule, and brought him to Gihon.

39 And Zadok the priest took [c] an horn of oil [d] out of the tabernacle, and [e] anointed Solomon. And they blew the trumpet; and [f] all the people said, God save king Solomon.

40 And all the people came up after him; and the people piped with † pipes, and [g] rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them.

adding, that his party were already got to that height of assurance, as to shout God save king Adonijah, as if king David were already dead, taking notice also, that they had not invited him to their feast; thereby intimating, that they resolved not to consult either God or David. He makes David sensible how much he was concerned to clear himself from having a hand in it, v. 24, 27. 'Is this thing done by my lord the king? If it be, he is not so faithful either to God's word or to his own, as we all took him to be; if it be not, it is high time we witness against the usurpation, and declare Solomon his successor. But if my lord the king know nothing of the matter, (as certainly he does not,) what daring insolence are Adonijah and his party guilty of!' Thus he endeavors to incense David against them, that he might act the more vigorously for the support of Solomon's interest. Note, Good men would do their duty, if they were reminded of it, and put upon it, and told what occasion there is for them to appear: and those who thus are their remembrances, do them a real kindness, as Nathan here did to David.

IV. David, hereupon, made a solemn declaration of his firm adherence to his former resolution, that Solomon should be his successor; Bath-sheba is called in, (v. 28.) and to her, as acting for and on behalf of her son, the king gives these fresh assurances. 1. He repeats his former promise and oath, v. 30. Though old, he remembers this. Note, An oath is too sacred a thing, one would think, to be forgotten. 2. He ratifies it with another, because the occasion called for it. His form of swearing seems to be what he commonly used on solemn occasions, 2 Sam. 4: 9. carrying in it a grateful acknowledgment of the goodness of God to him, which he now mentions to the glory of God, as Jacob, when he lay a dying; (Gen. 48: 16.) thus setting to his seal, from his own experience, that that was true, which the Lord spake by him; (Ps. 34: 22.) The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants. Dying saints ought to be witnesses for God, and speak of Him as they have found. Perhaps he speaks thus, on this occasion, to encourage his son and successor, to trust in God in the distresses he also might meet with.

Bath-sheba receives these assurances, (v. 31.) with great complaisance to the king's person; and hearty good wishes for the king's health. We should earnestly desire to prolong useful lives, however it may postpone any advantages of our own.

V. 32—40. We have here the [prompt and] effectual care David took, both to secure Solomon's right, and to preserve the public peace, by crushing Adonijah's project in the bud. Observe,

1. The express orders he gave, forthwith, with all possible solemnity, to proclaim Solomon. 1. Zadok and Nathan, the two ecclesiastical persons, must, in God's name, anoint him king: for though not the first of his family, as Saul and David were, yet he was made king by divine appointment, and his title was contested, which made it necessary that hereby it should be settled. This unction was typical of the designation and qualification of the Messiah, or Christ, the anointed One, on whom the Spirit, that oil of gladness, was poured without measure, Heb. 1: 9. Ps. 89: 20. And all real Christians, being heirs of the kingdom, (Jam. 2: 5.) do from Him receive the anointing, 1 John 2: 27. 2. The great officers, civil and military, are ordered to give public notice of this, and to express the public joy on this occasion, by sound of trumpet, by which the law of Moses directed the gracing of great solemnities; to this must be added the acclamations of the people, 'Let king Solomon live, let him prosper, let his kingdom be established and perpetuated, and let him long continue in the enjoyment of it;' so it had been promised concerning him, (Ps. 72: 15.) He shall live. 3. They must then bring him in state to the city of David, and he must sit on the throne of his father, as his substitute now, or viceroy, to despatch public business during his weakness, and be his successor after his death; He shall be king in my stead. It would be a great satisfaction to David, and to all concerned, to have this done immediately, that, on the demise of the king, there might be no dispute, or agitation, in the public affairs.

II. The great satisfaction Benaiah, in the name of the rest, professed in these orders, v. 36. This is the language of his faith in that promise of God, on which Solomon's government was founded. If we say as God says in his Word, we may hope that He will say as we say by his providence. To this he adds a prayer for Solomon, (v. 37.) that God would be with him as he had been with David, and make his throne greater. The wisest and best man in the world desires his children may be wiser and better than he, for he himself desires to be wiser and better than he is; and wisdom and goodness are true greatness.

III. The immediate execution of these orders, v. 38—40. No time was lost, but Solomon was brought in state to the place appointed, and there Zadok (not yet High Priest, but, we may suppose, the Suffragan, the Jews called him the Sagan, or second priest) anointed him by direction of Nathan, and David, v. 39. In the tabernacle, where the ark was now lodged, was kept, among other sacred things, the holy oil, for many religious services; thence Zadok took a horn of oil, which denotes both power and plenty, and therewith anointed Solomon: whom God calls He will qualify, which was signified by the anointing; usurpers, as Adonijah, had it not. Christ signifies anointed, and He is the King whom God hath set upon his holy hill of Zion, according to the decree, Ps. 2: 6, 7. Christians also are made to our God (and by Him) kings, and they have an unction from the Holy One, 1 John 2: 20.

The people, hereupon, express their great joy,

Verse 35.

The manner of [inauguration] seems thus:—1. The king elect was placed on the mule of his predecessor, and caused to ride abroad to one of the public wells, or to a river, where was the concourse of people, that they might see who he was that was appointed. Here, Solomon is taken to the river Gihon, to be anointed: the continual stream, or constantly running fountain, denoting the perpetuity of the kingdom. 2. The priest and prophet anointed him in the name of the Lord; and thereby signified that he should be endued with all kingly virtues; and should reign by, for, and under the Lord. 3. The trumpet was then to be blown, and solemn proclamation made, that he was anointed king. 4. He was then brought and solemnly placed on the throne, to signify that he had now assumed the reins of government, and was about to administer justice and judgment to the people.'

1 Chr. 23:1. 29:21—25.—Gihon.] A fountain near Jerusalem. (33. 2 Chr. 32:30.) It does not appear, that there was any special reason, why this spot was selected; but, probably, it was a place so much frequented, that it was peculiarly suited to make the transaction speedily known throughout the whole city. ID.

Verse 39.

An horn, &c.] Neither Absalom, nor Adonijah, regarded this expressive ceremony: perhaps presuming on the right of primogeniture; for we do not find that kings, who succeeded as the first-born of their predecessors, without any interruption, were anointed. (Notes, 19: 15—17. 1 Sam. 10:1. 16:13. 2 K. 9:5—10. 11:12.) ID.

41 And Adonijah and all the guests that were with him heard it, [h] as they had made an end of eating. And when Joab heard the sound of the trumpet, he said, [i] Wherefore is this noise of [k] the city being in an uproar?

42 And while he yet spake, behold, [l] Jonathan the son of Abiathar the priest came: and Adonijah said unto him, Come in; for thou art [m] a valiant man, and bringest good tidings.

43 And Jonathan answered and said to Adonijah, [n] Verily our lord king David hath made Solomon king.

44 And the king hath sent with him Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and they have caused him to ride upon the king's mule.

45 And Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet have anointed him king in Gihon: and they are come up from thence rejoicing, so that [o] the city rang again. [p] This is the noise that ye have heard.

46 And also Solomon [q] sitteth on the throne of the kingdom.

47 And moreover, the king's servants came to [r] bless our lord king David, saying, [s] God make the name of Solomon better than thy name, and make his throne greater than thy throne: and the king [t] bowed himself upon the bed.

48 And also thus said the king, [u] Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, [x] which hath given one to sit on my throne this day, [y] mine eyes even seeing it.

49 And [z] all the guests that were with Adonijah were afraid, and rose up, and went every man his way.

50 And Adonijah feared because of Solomon, and arose, and went, and [a] caught hold on the horns of the altar.

51 And it was told Solomon, saying, Behold, Adonijah feareth king Solomon: for lo, he hath caught hold on the horns of the altar, saying, Let king Solomon swear unto me today, that he will not slay his servant with the sword.

52 And Solomon said, If he will show himself a worthy man, [b] there shall not an hair of him fall to the earth; but if [c] wickedness shall be found in him, he shall die.

53 So king Solomon sent, and they brought him down from the altar. And he came and [d] bowed himself to king Solomon: and Solomon said unto him, [e] Go to thine house.

v. 40. Hereby they declared their concurrence in the choice, and that he was not forced upon them, but cheerfully accepted by them. The power of a [good] prince can be little satisfaction to himself, unless he knows it to be a satisfaction to his people. Every Israelite indeed rejoices in the exaltation of the Son of David.

V. 41—53. We have here, I. The tidings of Solomon's inauguration brought to Adonijah and his party, in the midst of their jollity. It should seem, it was a great while before they made an end of eating, for all the affair of Solomon's anointing was ordered, done, and finished, while they were at dinner, glutting themselves. They who oppose Christ, are commonly such as serve their own belly, and make a god of it. Their long feast intimates likewise that they were very secure, and confident, else they would not have lost so much time. So the old world and Sodom were secure and sensual, when their destruction came, Luke 17: 26, &c. Adonijah is very confident, v. 42. Usurpers flatter themselves with the hopes of success, and those are commonly least timorous, whose condition is most dangerous. But those who do evil deeds, may expect evil tidings; the worthiest man will bring them the worst news, as the priest's son did here to Adonijah, v. 43.

He relates to them very particularly, with what great solemnity and general satisfaction Solomon was made king, v. 44, 45. The people were pleased, witness their joyful acclamations, v. 45. The courtiers were pleased; the king's servants attended him with an address of congratulation on the occasion, v. 47. they blessed king David, applauded his prudent care, acknowledged their happiness under his government, and prayed for his recovery. They also prayed for Solomon, that God would make his name better than his father's, which it might well be, when he had his father's foundation to build on; a child, on a giant's shoulders, is taller than the giant himself. The king himself is pleased; he bowed himself upon the bed, not only to signify his acceptance of his servants' address, but to offer up his own address to God, v. 48. Note, It is a great satisfaction to good men, at death, to see the affairs of their families in a good state, and religion prosperous.

II. The effectual crush this gave to Adonijah's attempt, v. 49. The triumphing of the wicked is short.

III. The terror Adonijah himself was in, and the course he took to secure himself; they who oppose Christ and his kingdom, will shortly be made to tremble before Him, and call, in vain, to rocks and mountains to shelter them from his wrath. He threw himself upon the mercy of his prince. Perhaps he had formerly slighted the service of the altar, yet now he courts the protection of it. Many who, in the day of their security, neglect the great salvation, under the arrest of the terrors of the Lord, would gladly be beholden to Christ and his merit, and, when it is too late, will catch hold of the horns of that altar.

IV. His humble address to Solomon for mercy By those who brought Solomon tidings where he was, he sent a request for his life, v. 51. He owns Solomon for his prince, and himself his servant; dares not justify himself, but makes supplication to his judge. It was a great change with him; he that, in the morning, was grasping at a crown, is, before night, begging for his life.

V. Solomon's orders concerning him. He discharged him, on his good behavior, v. 52, 53. He considers him his brother; it was the first offence, perhaps: and then being so soon made sensible of his error, and not persisting in his rebellion, he might prove, not only a peaceable, but a serviceable subject; therefore, if he will conduct himself well for the future, what is past shall be pardoned: but, if otherwise, execution shall be awarded against him. Thus the Son of David receives those to mercy, that have been rebellious: if they will return to their allegiance, and be faithful to their Sovereign, their former crimes shall not be mentioned against them; but if still they continue in the interests of the world and the flesh, that will be their ruin. Solomon not only gave Adonijah his life, but his estate, thus establishing his throne by mercy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 28—53. The true believer loves to review his past experience: even the frequent recollection of his distresses, from all which 'the LORD hath redeemed him,' increases his comfort as well as his gratitude; and inspires him with hope, and animates him to duty, though under the decays of nature, and at the approach of death. In preparation for that event, we should so arrange all our domestic or more public concerns, as may best secure peace and good to the survivors: and we should lose no time before we do so useful a work, even though it somewhat interrupt our religious exercises.—Those enterprises must end well, which are conducted with piety and integrity, in simple dependence on God, and cordial acquiescence in his will.—They who are engaged in a bad cause, are exposed to continual terrors and no good man can bring other than evil tidings to those who are rebelling against God and the king.—Clemency becomes those in power, especially towards such as have rather injured them than the public: yet, no government can pardon or tolerate a traitor, who perseveres in his treasonable machinations. SCOTT.

Verse 42.

(2 Sam. 17:17—21.) It is probable, that Jonathan was not invited to the feast, nor concerned in the conspiracy; but he went to warn his father of the danger: though some think he was left in the city to learn what should occur, and bring an account to Adonijah. SCOTT.

CHAP. II.

David charges Solomon to serve God; and directs him how to act towards Joab, the sons of Barzillai, and Shimei, 1—9. His death, and the years of his reign, 10,11. Solomon succeeds him, 12. Adonijah persuades Bathsheba to ask Solomon to give him Abishag to wife; and is put to death, 13—25. Abiathar's life is spared, but he is deprived of the high priesthood, 26, 27. Joab, having fled to the altar, is there put to death, 28—34. Benaiah succeeds Joab, and Zadok, Abiathar, 35. Shimei is, by Solomon, required to reside in Jerusalem, and engages by oath to do so: but breaking his engagement, he is put to death, 36—46.

NOW [a] the days of David drew nigh that he should die; and he [b] charged Solomon his son, saying,

2 [c] I go the way of all the earth: [d] be thou strong therefore, and [e] show thyself a man;

3 And [f] keep the charge of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his [g] statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his [h] testimonies, [i] as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest * prosper in all that thou doest, and [k] whithersoever thou turnest thyself:

4 [l] That the LORD may continue [m] his word which he spake concerning me, saying, If thy children take heed to their way to [n] walk before me in truth, [o] with all their heart and with all their soul, there shall not † fail thee (said he) a man on the throne of Israel.

5 Moreover, thou knowest also what [p] Joab the son of Zeruiah did to me, and what he did to the two captains of the host of Israel, unto [q] Abner the son of Ner, and unto [r] Amasa the son of [s] Jether, whom he slew, and ‡ shed the blood of war in peace, and [t] put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about his loins, and in his shoes that were on his feet.

6 Do therefore [u] according to thy wisdom, and [x] let not his hoar head go down to the grave [y] in peace.

7 But show kindness unto the sons of [z] Barzillai the Gileadite, and let them be of those that [a] eat at thy table: for so they came to me [b] when I fled because of Absalom thy brother.

8 And, behold, thou hast with thee [c] Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite of Bahurim, which cursed me with a § grievous curse in the day when I went to Mahanaim: but [d] he came down to meet me at Jordan, and I sware to him by the LORD, saying, I will not put thee to death with the sword.

9 Now therefore [e] hold him not guiltless: for thou art [f] a wise man,

CHAP. II. V. 1—11. I. The charge and instructions David, when dying, gave to Solomon, his son, and declared successor. He is not afraid to hear or speak of dying: I go the way of all the earth, v. 2. Heb. I am walking in it.

1. He charges him, in general, to keep God's commandments, and to make conscience of his duty, v. 2—4. He prescribes to him, (1.) A good rule to act by, the divine will. The authority of a dying father is much, but nothing to the charge of a living God. The written Word is our rule; Solomon must himself do as was written in the law of Moses. (2.) A good spirit to act with; Be strong, and show thyself a man, though, in years, but a child. Those that would keep the charge of the Lord their God, must put on resolution. (3.) Good reasons for all this; 'it is the way to prosper, and secure prosperity in thy kingdom.' Let each, in his own age, successively, keep God's charge, then God will be sure to continue his word. We never let fall the promise, till we let fall the precept. God had promised David, the Messiah should come from his loins; and that promise was absolute: but the promise, that there should not fail him a man on the throne of Israel, was conditional; if his seed behave themselves as they should. If Solomon, in his day, fulfil the condition, he does his part toward perpetuating it. The condition is, that he walk before God; in order whereunto, he must take heed to his way. In order to our constancy in religion, nothing is more necessary than caution and circumspection.

2. He gives him directions concerning some particular persons, what to do with them, that he might make up his deficiencies, in justice to some and kindness to others.

(1.) Joab, v. 5. David was now conscious he had not done well to spare him, when he had made himself once and again obnoxious to the law, by murder. The murder of a subject is a wrong to the prince, a loss to him, and against the peace of his sovereignty. These murders were particularly against David, reflecting on his reputation. Magistrates are the avengers of the blood of those they have the charge of. It aggravated Joab's crime, that he was neither ashamed of the sin, nor afraid of the punishment, but daringly wore the girdle and shoes that were stained with innocent blood, in defiance of the justice both of God and the king. David refers him to Solomon's wisdom, (v. 6.) with an intimation that he left him to his justice. Though he has been long reprieved, he shall be reckoned with at last; time does not wear out the guilt of any sin, particularly not of murder.

(2.) Barzillai's family; whom he orders him to be kind to for Barzillai's sake, who, we may suppose, by this time, was dead, v. 7. When David, on his death-bed, was remembering the injuries that had been done, he could not forget the kindnesses that had been shown, but leaves it as a charge on his son to return them. Note, The kindnesses we have received from our friends, must not be buried, either in their graves or ours, but our children must return them to theirs. Hence, perhaps, Solomon fetched that rule, (Prov.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Solomon cou'd not at this time be more than 20 years of age; and, probably, he was not so much: an early period for him to enter on so weighty a charge, as the government of God's people! (3:5—14.) But he was endowed with extraordinary wisdom [as his first manly act, 1:52, 53. shows'; and David charged and exhorted him to show all Israel, that though he was but a child in years, he was a man in capacity and attention to business. (Num. 27:19. 1 Tim. 4:11—16. 2 Tim. 2:1, 2.) SCOTT.

Verse 3.

(Josh. 1:7, 8. 1 Chr. 22:11—13. 28:9.) Testimonies, in this connection, may signify those laws, which preserved the remembrance of great events; as the sabbaths, the passover, and others. (Deut. 6:1. Ps. 19:7—11. Is. 8:16, 20.)—Nothing can be more manifest, than that the law of Moses, as written in the Pentateuch, was known at this time. (Deut. 17:16—18.) ID.

Verse 4.

(Gen. 18:18, 19. 2 Sam. 7:12—16.) The continuance of the kingdom to David's posterity was sure, as it respected the Messiah and his spiritual reign: nor would every transgression forfeit the temporal kingdom entailed on his descendants; for chastisements would be used to bring them to repentance: yet obstinate and aggravated disobedience would cut off the entail. Thus the Lord punished Solomon's idolatry by the defection of the ten tribes from his son: (11:9—13. 12:8—15.) and, at length, the family of David was deprived of all authority, till Christ came and set up his spiritual kingdom. ID.

Verses 5, 6.

These dying counsels of David ought by no means to be imputed to personal resentment; but to a regard to justice, and a wise and pious concern for the security of Solomon's throne, which was the cause of God and of Israel. Joab's murders were crimes against David, as committed on two men who were connected with David: and yet they were so conducted, as to bring him into suspicion as if privy to them.—It is observable, that David did not blame Joab for killing Absalom: being doubtless conscious that he deserved to die; and that his own desire to spare him was a weakness and a sin. (2 Sam. 16:5—14. 19:19—23.) Shimei, had he been suitably affected with David's lenity, and acted properly afterwards, would have been fully and finally pardoned. ID.

(9.) Bring thou.] 'Rather, bring thou not. The negative particle (lo, not,) in this former clause, "hold him not guiltless," should be repeated in this latter clause, though not expressed; instances of which occur frequently in the Heb. Bible.' Dr. A. Clarke. So Kennicott, who says, 'It is not uncommon in the Heb. to omit the negative in the second part of the sentence, and to consider it as repeated, when it has been once expressed, and is followed by the connecting particle. Thus at Is. 13:22. the late learned annotator says, "The negative is repeated or referred to, by the conjunction vau, (and,) as in many other places." Dr. K. also quotes Is. 23:4. Ps. 1:5. 9:18. &c. &c. and adds, Did Solomon understand he was to kill Shimei in consequence of this v.? Certainly he did not; for, after he had immediately commanded Joab to be slain, in obedience to his father, he sends for Shimei, and knowing [he was so violent and ill-affected a character] that he must be watched, he confines him to the city, &c.' See Dr. A. Clarke. So that David's charge only meant to say 'kill him not now, as you ought to kill Joab, at once: but have an eye on him.' ED.

10 ¶ So [i] David slept with his fathers, and was buried in [j] the city of David.

11 And the days that David [k] reigned over Israel were forty years: seven years reigned he in Hebron, and thirty and three years reigned he in Jerusalem.

12 ¶ Then [l] sat Solomon upon the throne of David his father; and [m] his kingdom was established greatly.

13 And [n] Adonijah the son of Haggith came to Bath-sheba the mother of Solomon. And she said, [o] Comest thou peaceably? and he said, Peaceably.

14 He said moreover, [p] I have somewhat to say unto thee. And she said, Say on.

15 And he said, [q] Thou knowest that the kingdom was mine, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign: howbeit the kingdom is turned about, and is become my brother's; for [r] it was his from the LORD.

16 And now I ask one petition of thee, [*] deny me not. And she said unto him, Say on.

17 And he said, Speak, I pray thee, unto Solomon the king, (for he will not say thee nay,) that he give me [s] Abishag the Shunammite to wife.

18 And Bath-sheba said, [t] Well; I will speak for thee unto the king.

19 Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon to speak unto him for Adonijah. And the king [u] rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother; and [x] she sat on his right hand.

20 Then she said, [y] I desire one small petition of thee; I pray thee, say me not nay. And the king said unto her, [z] Ask on, my mother, for I will not say thee nay.

21 And she said, [a] Let Abishag the Shunammite be given to Adonijah thy brother to wife.

22 And king Solomon answered and said unto his mother, And [b] why dost thou ask Abishag the Shunammite for Adonijah? ask for him [c] the kingdom also; for he is mine elder brother; even for him, and for Abiathar the priest, and for Joab the son of Zeruiah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. It is desirable to be habitually and calmly expecting the approach of death; a dark and gloomy road indeed it is for the workers of iniquity, to a still more dark and dreadful place; but rendered cheerful to the righteous, by the presence of the Lord, and by the hopes of complete felicity. Whilst they are supported by these lively hopes and strong consolations, how becoming is it for them to animate their survivors and successors, to fill up their stations in the church of God, and in society, after a proper manner!—Young men, who are called to important services, should be cautioned by their seniors to act with gravity and prudence, that they may prevent others 'from despising their youth.'—We can neither act with true wisdom, nor prosper in our undertakings further, than we make the whole Word of God our rule and our hope; nor can we finally come short of all desirable success, if we do this, however appearances may for a while be against us.—In human governments undue lenity is an evidence of imbecility, want of wisdom, and disregard to justice. Can it then be supposed, that the King of heaven will so indiscriminately exercise mercy, as not to magnify his law, and show decidedly his abhorrence of iniquity?—No human authority has a right to pardon wilful murder: and the magistrate, who presumes to do so, is unfaithful to Him, who has commissioned him to execute vengeance on evil doers; and not only exposes the peaceable subject, but brings guilt on his own soul, on his family, and on the land.—They, therefore, who act 'according to wisdom,' will not let the murderer, though advanced in years, or exalted in rank, go down to the grave in peace: and in our proper stations we may promote the execution of the law upon them. Nay, in doing this, we may 'serve our generation according to the will of God,' and prepare for death; no less than when we are recompensing our benefactors, and doing acts of kindness to the distressed. SCOTT.

Verse 20.

For I, &c.] All such general promises imply the supposition, that the request is lawful and proper to be granted: for even the assurances of God's Word, that whatever we ask of Him shall be given, admit of a similar limitation: i. e. if consistent with his glory, and for our real good. (Rom. 8:24—27. Jam. 4:1—3. 1 John 5:14, 15.) SCOTT.

23 Then king Solomon sware by the LORD, saying, [d] God do so to me, and more also, if Adonijah have not [e] spoken this word against his own life.

24 Now therefore, [f] as the LORD liveth, which hath established me, and [g] set me on the throne of David my father, and who hath [h] made me an house, [i] as he promised, Adonijah shall be [k] put to death this day.

25 And king Solomon sent by the hand of Benaiah the son of Jehoiada: and [l] he fell upon him, that he died.

[Practical Observations.]

26 ¶ And unto [m] Abiathar the priest said the king, Get thee to [n] Anathoth, unto thine own fields; for thou art [*] worthy of death: but I will not at this time put thee to death, [o] because thou barest the ark of the Lord GOD before David my father, and [p] because thou hast been afflicted in all wherein my father was afflicted.

27 So Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the LORD; [q] that he might fulfil the the word of the LORD, durst not make suit to Abishag immediately, (he knew she was at Solomon's disposal, and he would justly resent it, if his consent were not first obtained, as even Ish-bosheth did, in a like case, 2 Sam. 3: 7.) nor durst he apply himself immediately to Solomon, knowing he lay under his displeasure; but he engaged Bath-sheba to befriend him, who would be forward to believe it a matter of love, and not apt to suspect it a matter of policy. She was surprised to see him in her apartment, but he came, he said, only to ask a favor, v. 13—17. which, if he may but obtain, he will thankfully accept, (1.) As a compensation for his loss of the kingdom. So he insinuates, (v. 15.) 'Thou knowest the kingdom was mine, as my father's eldest son living at the time of his death, and all Israel set their faces on me.' But it was false, there were but a few on his side; yet thus he would represent himself as an object of compassion. (2.) As his reward for his acquiescence in that loss. He owns Solomon's right to the kingdom. 'It was his from the Lord, I was foolish in offering to contest it; and now that it is turned about to him, I am satisfied.' Thus he pretends to be well pleased with Solomon's accession to the throne, when he is doing all he can to give him disturbance. His words were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart.

3. Bath-sheba's address to Solomon on his behalf, v. 18, 19. Solomon received her with all the respect owing to a mother, though himself a king, according to the law of the fifth commandment. Children, not only when grown up, but when grown great, must honor their parents, and behave dutifully and respectfully toward them. Despise not thy mother, when she is old. As a further instance of his deference, when his mother presented a petition to him, he promised not to say her nay. A promise which both he and she understood with this necessary limitation, provided it be just and reasonable, and fit to be granted; but if it were otherwise, he was sure he should convince her it was so, and then she would withdraw it. She tells him her errand, at last, v. 21. It was strange she did not suspect the treason, but more strange she did not abhor the incest: but either she did not take Abishag to be David's wife, because the marriage was not consummated, or she thought it might be dispensed with, to gratify Adonijah, in consideration of his tame submission. This was her weakness and folly; it was well she was not regent. Note, They that have the ear of princes and great men, as it is their wisdom not to be too prodigal of their interest, so it is their duty never to use it for the assistance of sin, or furtherance of any wicked design. Let not princes be asked that which they ought not to grant. It ill becomes a good man to prefer a bad request, or appear in a bad cause.

4. Solomon's just and judicious rejection of the request, without violation of his general promise, v. 20. If Herod had not had a mind to cut off John Baptist's head, he would not have thought himself obliged to do it by a general promise, like this, made to Herodias. The best friend we have in the world must not have such an interest in us as to bring us to do a wrong thing, either unjust or unwise. (1.) Solomon convinces his mother of the unreasonableness of the request, and shows her the tendency of it, which before she was not aware of. His reply is somewhat sharp, v. 22. Probably, he had information, or strong cause to suspect Adonijah was plotting with Joab and Abiathar to give him disturbance, which warranted him to put this construction on Adonijah's request. (2.) He convicts and condemns Adonijah for his pretensions, and both with an oath, v. 24. God had interposed Himself with an oath, that He would establish David's throne, (Ps. 89: 35.) therefore Solomon pledges the same assurance to secure that establishment, by cutting off the enemies of it. Thus the ruin of the enemies of Christ's kingdom is as sure as the stability of his kingdom, and both as sure as the being and life of God, the Founder of it. It is strange Adonijah may not be heard to speak for himself: but Solomon's wisdom did not see it needful to examine the matter any further; it was plain enough Adonijah aimed at the crown, and Solomon cannot be safe while he lives. Ambitious, turbulent spirits commonly prepare for themselves the instruments of death. Many a head has been lost by catching at a crown.

V. 26—34. Abiathar and Joab were both aiding and abetting in Adonijah's rebellious attempt, and, probably, at the bottom of the motion for Abishag, and, it should seem, Solomon knew it, v. 22. This was, in both, an intolerable affront, both to God and to the government; and the worse, because of their high station, and the great influence of their example. They therefore come next to be reckoned with: both equally guilty of the treason, but, in the judgment passed on them, differently treated, and with good reason.
